The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I should like, for the same reason indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], to introduce a bill so that the committee can get at it promptly early next week.

Mr. HARRIS. I think anything in the form of morning business at this time is in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement of yesterday. Of course I would not interpose an objection to the wish of any Senator if I could avoid it.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not want to object, but I want to remind the Senate of the unanimous-consent agreement of yesterday.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it is proper for me to say that I did not agree with the majority of the Committee on Finance in the report of the substitute for the bill of the House of Representatives, now under consideration, but I hope to be pardoned for occupying the time of the Senate, even briefly, on a topic to which it no longer delights to listen. I know that, as chairman of the committee referred to, it was never expected that my views could any more be twisted into harmony with those of the majority of the committee than that the views of the majority could be straightened out so as to be in tune with mine.

The President asked Congress to amend the terms of the law under which he is authorized to sell bonds and to procure gold, to preserve the equal value of the various kinds of money now in the hands of our people, so that the bonds would bear a lower rate of interest, and mature at an earlier date. Was that not a fair request? The House of Representatives promptly responded to the President's demand, and supplemented it with an emergency tariff revenue bill, as a more permanent remedy against the export of gold. But the Senate Committee on Finance have proposed, as a substitute for the bond bill, a bill for the free coinage of silver, something too much of which is our present embarrassment. This may not be the first time when bread has been asked for that a stone has been presented, but it is the first time that a committee of the Senate seems to have perpetrated a practical joke almost good enough for the clown of Barnum's menagerie.

When any circumstances, or any political administration, as for two years past, compels our people to practice extreme care lest their daily expenditures exceed their income, it will be expected that Congress will show some sympathy with the economical virtues, and at once cut down any excess of revenue or of expenditure, but a deficient national income should be not less swiftly remedied than an excess. The present Administration, however, exhibits a bashful diffidence about acknowledging any deficiency of revenue derived from a tariff bereaved of its parents in early infancy, but with their hands behind them they may quietly take whatever money Congress may place in their hands for the Treasury, where the outflow of gold has been so swift as to make even the heads of the keepers dizzy. Certainly there is no mathematical equation between the monthly receipts and monthly expenditures, and the public debt visibly expands more rapidly than the public credit.

Changes of revenue laws, or of duties on imports of foreign merchandise, are always troublesome to administer, as well both to home as to foreign trade, and are only advisable when demanded by potential reasons or when substantial improvements will justify the changes made. The reasons now for change are abundant, but it may be unnecessary to mention more than one, and that is a deficit of revenue.

If this is disputed, it will only be necessary to remember that in 1893 there was a surplus of only $2,416,000, and that there has been a deficit each year since.

In December, 1893, the Secretary of the Treasury estimated a deficit of revenue for 1894 at $28,000,000, and a surplus for 1895 of $6,120,958.

The report of the Secretary, December 3, 1894, however, showed a deficit of $69,803,260, and instead of a surplus in 1895 there was an estimated deficit of $20,000,000, and an estimated surplus for 1896 of $28,814,920.

The report of the Secretary December 10, 1895, showed a deficit of $42,805,223, and estimated a deficit for 1896 of $17,000,000 and a surplus in 1897 of $6,908,926.83.

If further evidence of a lack of revenue should be asked, it may be found in the increase of our public debt. From 1889 to 1893 there was a large amount of the public debt paid. The present Administration has already obtained $162,000,000 of gold for which bonds have been issued, and proposals for one hundred millions more are outstanding. This has not been for ordinary expenditures, although more than half of the amount has been so used, but for a purpose not less necessary—the preservation of the public faith and the maintenance of a sound currency. The deficit of revenue should be remedied, and as early as possible.

The financial condition and policy of France is more frequently commended by silver orators as an example worthy of imitation than the condition and policy of any other people; and yet France abandoned the free coinage of silver more than twenty years ago, and never coined silver without exacting a sufficient seigniorage to pay for the risk as well as for the expense of coinage. France has not recently furnished any market for silver, and has only kept her old and usual stock in circulation. Nor is paper money there redeemed in anything better than silver, save at the pleasure of the Bank of France, which often chooses to pay only a small percentage of gold and the remainder in silver.

But silver in France is maintained at par with gold because the Government long ago suspended its coinage, and because there is no blustering silver party, and no silver-plated Democratic party there daily striving to pull down their money standard to that of depreciated silver; but they keep silver to the amount of $386,000,000, with $772,000,000 of gold, on the ratio of 15½ to 1.

The United States has been the friend and patron of silver to its own hurt, and made a large market for the white metal while many other markets were closed. It has coined silver by the million, and kept it with all of our currency at an equal value with the best money of the world.

Heretofore the Government has been required to buy only a fixed quantity of silver, that it did not want, and to pay no more for it than the existing commercial value. But under the free-coinage substitute, proposed for the bond bill of the House of Representatives, the Government will be required to run in debt, for what it does not want, and to give its notes for an indefinite amount of silver, limited only by the annual product of the whole world, and at a fixed cost of twice its commercial value, or at the rate of $1.29 per ounce, instead of its present value of 67 cents per ounce.

If our late investments of nearly five hundred millions in silver have been notoriously improvident and unprofitable, the disastrous results will appear as a drop in the bucket when compared with what must flow from the enormity of the present proposal, which is to open all of our mints to the free coinage not only of all our own silver product, but that also of all the world, excluding nobody from Dan to Beersheba, and to tempt a great increase of the annual product both at home and abroad by offering United States obligations for it at double the sum it now commands in any other market.

The vast product, whether in silver bullion or silver dollars, once in the possession of the Government must stay there forever, defunct as an Egyptian mummy, as the public long ago refused to aid in its larger practical circulation.

If an individual spendthrift were to make a like exhibition of incapacity to manage his financial affairs, there is not a court of any State having jurisdiction of the subject that would refuse, if asked, the appointment of a guardian.

Whenever the issuance of depreciated money is tolerated, so as to permit an increase of the amount outstanding, as is proposed by the silver free-coinage substitute for the bond bill, now under consideration, a further inexorable depreciation of such money must follow, as our own recent unhappy experience sufficiently demonstrates. When we began to coin silver dollars in 1878, silver was worth $1.20 per ounce, and the silver in our dollar was worth 93 cents, and has been growing less month by month ever since. Silver is now worth 67 cents per ounce, and the amount in the silver dollar is worth 52 cents only. It fell under the act of 1878 and continued to fall to a lower depth under the act of 1890.

That was the result of an honest effort of the United States Government alone to prop up the value of the world's silver money, and the dollar had a further drop from 93 cents to 52 cents.

The United States since 1878 has bought 459,946,701 ounces of silver, for which $464,210,262.96 has been paid, but its present value is only $309,536,118.17, which shows a loss on the part of the Government of $154,674,143.79.

This is the outcome of our years of bitter experience in the vain attempt to increase and maintain the ancient value of silver. No other nation yet appears willing to follow our example in this line of national policy.

We have more than once during this debate been warned of the danger to which we may soon be exposed by a flood of cheap Asiatic products imported from India, China, and Japan, where cheap wages are paid to laboring men in cheap silver, and strange as it may appear to sane men we are now seriously urged to adopt the free coinage of silver in order to equalize financial exchange, so as to compete with these oriental artisans, who are blessed with hardly a tithe, certainly with not one-fourth, of the American compensation, and appear to be contented with silver money at about half of its face value. To me this looks only as the first step in equalizing the wages of labor instead of exchanges.

First, it is proposed to establish the silver standard of money, and unless this is to be followed by the Asiatic standard of wages also, it is difficult to see how these coming rivals are to be checkmated simply by our free coinage of silver.

In Mexico any of our money, being equivalent to gold, can there be exchanged for about double the amount in Mexican silver, with which cattle can there be bought at less cost than in the United States. But the contention here that a gold standard of money fixes low prices for all products and that a silver standard fixes high prices can not be true. Wheat is bought for silver rupees in India and sold profitably in England for gold.

The largest share of our imports come from Europe and Great Britain, and if we get such imports at low prices in consequence of their gold standard, so much the better for us. But we all know the sharpest competition we meet in selling agricultural products and provisions abroad arises from countries using a silver currency only, where they are destitute of skilled labor, and where cheap wages prevail. A market abroad for any surplus of wheat or corn, beef or pork, only occurs when the United States can undersell the rest of the world. Therefore the home market should be preserved. The price of cotton will not be fixed here until we are able to manufacture the major part of the crop at home. Asiatic competition can only be met by an American tariff, and can not be overcome by providing a low standard of money to pay for whatever we have to sell.

The absurdity of free coinage as a protection against oriental industrial rivals can not well be concealed. We might with almost equal propriety be invited to introduce an Asiatic plague, and have it just as logically urged, on the ground that it has long prevailed in Asia and yet they have not all died there. Instead of a remedy, free coinage of silver would be an aggravation of a sorry condition, offering, as it would, to American wage earners a standard silver dollar, though known to be depreciated to half of its former value, and forcing the American people to accept that depreciated standard of money for all of their immense annual productions.

The feeble pretense that the free coinage of silver dollars on the present ratio of 16 of silver to 1 of gold would not deprive silver money of its parity with gold never became respectable by its repetition, and is no longer serviceable even in the support of a wild and ponderous experiment. Seven hundred grains of pure silver may be had in any market for $1, and when we are fanatically urged to coin silver legal-tender dollars containing only 371¼ grains of pure silver, obviously it must be expected that some people are to find pleasure in being cheated, as well as those who cheat. The proposition is to set up a standard of silver money worth but half its nominal value, and then look in the face of our creditors and claim to be honest. "You may have a good reason," said Dr. Johnson, "why two and two make five, but they will still make but four."

The bimetallism of free-coinage advocates, claiming here to be for both gold and silver on the existing ratio, will not fail to be regarded as an organized hypocrisy. Knowing that the present Administration must buy gold to preserve our currency from depreciation, they refuse to amend existing laws and thus force its purchase at the highest rates of interest and for the longest term of years. Really, this kind of bimetallism is not on speaking terms with gold, which seems to be fleeing away, and yet they refuse to invite its return or to open any doors through which it might come back to its former home.

Some whispered threats have floated in the air that the extreme silver men, now fraternizing here and at home with the Republican party, would band themselves together on one dominant idea, forsaking all others, and, with auxiliary Democratic aid, hitch on to the tail of a great Republican measure, at the first opportunity, some tinkling silver amendment, hoping thereby to secure a silver triumph of a hybrid combination, although the grand old Republican party might perish. But there is little fear of these eruptive threats; for, if carried out, the riot act might be read at home to the offenders, upon whom public opinion would not fail to place its brand, and, whatever party might survive, not all of the garroters of the Republican party would be found among its members.

The Southern people can hardly be expected to see with much complacency over $100,000,000 annually expended for pensions to the survivors of our great Union Army, but they should bear in mind that these survivors are now diminishing by thousands year by year, and that the Confederates must be held responsible for the first gun in a deplorable war where they then took the chances whether their surviving and bruised soldiers or those of the Union Army should be rewarded for their heroic services. The Northern people were subjected to an enormous expense, national and State, to support the Union, and now by far the greater part of the pension money is paid by the more populous North as the largest consumers of merchandise upon which revenue has been collected.

Where silver mines abound, the raising of silver bullion is far more profitable than the cultivation of wheat, corn, or potatoes.

The amount of silver employed in the arts by the United States in 1894 was $9,661,871, or nearly three times as much as by Great Britain.

The Secretary of the Treasury annually fixes the value at which foreign coins shall be reckoned in computing the valuation of imported foreign merchandise. This year South American dollars were fixed at only a fraction above 49 cents, and Mexican dollars at 53 cents. Would this be "four square to the world," while the value of our dollars containing about the same amount of silver is fixed at one hundred cents?

Silver is mainly utilized as pocket change, and for anything more it is cumbrous and rarely used. No man owing to his merchant or to his bank a thousand dollars thinks of lugging along 60 pounds of silver to pay it. The annual industrial products of the United States amount to twelve thousand million dollars, or more, perhaps, than those of half of Europe, and our foreign trade is largely increasing. A silver currency would throw all these vast interests into a state of decrepitude. Five of our young and thrifty States, so ably represented in the Senate, now having considerably less than a million of present population, yet produce nine-tenths of the entire annual silver product of the United States. If silver were now rehabilitated, so that no more silver bullion should be produced than was produced fifty years ago, and at no cheaper cost, there would be no urgency for free coinage. The urgency is to induce the Government to do what no other Government on the globe is doing or will do alone.

The world's product of silver for the latest year of which we have any report was very large in spite of its low price. Its free coinage on the old ratio would amount to precisely the same thing as a standing offer by our Government for the purchase of all or any part of the world's product at $1.29 per ounce, as the Government would have the silver and issue its obligations therefor, which our people would have to redeem by accepting them as legal tender for any property or for debts. The Government would cease all quasi redemption of silver dollars, and all the loss from their overvaluation would fall upon their holders or the holders of silver certificates.

The increased product of silver throughout the world, from the rich mines and the poor, as well as that obtained from lead and copper ores as a secondary product, would be very large. Some of the mines in Nevada are too lean now to pay any profit, while others in Colorado produce silver bullion at a cost of less than 25 cents per ounce, and these give birth, not to gold bugs, but to silver millionaires.

The tired-out accusation that a diminished product of gold had greatly augmented its value has been refuted by the high authority of Mulhall, according to whom the world's total stock of gold in 1850 was $2,535,000,000, and in 1890 it had increased to $5,175,000,000, and has been increasing annually ever since.

Gold is wholly democratic in its character, a good neighbor, and never pushes silver from its company. So long as a just ratio is maintained, gold willingly does the heaviest part of the work. Depreciated legal-tender money, whether silver or paper, tolerates no gold.

I am aware that the largest half of the Democratic party in our Southern States has ceased to support with Jacksonian fidelity and courage the sound-money doctrine of their fathers, but has met their semirepudiating antagonists by accepting their subterranean silver platform, and they are now glued together by an equal hostility to banks, railroads, and home-built ships, having only some trifling unadjusted controversies about a proper distribution of future spoils and proper protection on wool, which they feel sure can be sweetly adjusted on the Kentucky plan, by a judicious separation of their platform from their candidates.

Will the free coinage of silver be a godsend to any part of our country, or confer a goodly prestige upon any party? There are many States in our great Republic, rich in varied natural resources, and now wanting nothing so much as an early increase of population and capital to place them in the front rank of a prosperous people. Will the white-money metal alone of South America or of China attract anything of population, or capital, or confidence to any of our States? I confess to some apprehension that free coinage would be more likely to cause a withdrawal of some part of what has long been supposed to have there been firmly planted.

Surely the South would make nothing by giving the world a chance to buy the cotton crop with cheap silver, nor can it be hoped to cheapen the cost of labor by paying its wages in cheap silver, as that labor must have subsistence. Does it now get or ask for anything more?

There are some gentlemen who confidently predict the overthrow of the gold standard party, as though that would insure the enthronement of the single silver standard party. I am not aware of a single gold standard party in America; but there is a large party—the national Republican party—now in excellent health, which proposes to maintain both gold and silver in circulation, and to keep both metals in good health. The recent elections appear to show that the people have great confidence in the Republican party, and the nation's financial affairs will be intrusted to that party and to no other. The election of Republican governors in such States as New Jersey, Maryland, and Kentucky indicates that the old Whig States of the South are wheeling into line with their former brethren on questions which concern their industrial prosperity. The solid Republican Representative delegations in Congress can not be much of an encouraging sign to the new and nameless silver party; but there they stand, look at them: Michigan with its 12 members, Wisconsin with 10, Indiana with 13, Iowa with 11, Minnesota with 7, and many other smaller States, to which may be added such States as Pennsylvania with all Republican members but 2 out of a total of 28; Ohio all but 2 of 21; Missouri all but 5 of 15; Illinois all but 3 of 25; California all but 1 of 7; New Jersey all but 1 of 8; New York all but 6 of 34, and Massachusetts all but 1 of 13. These are the bulwarks which will prevent the further invasion of the silver epidemic.

Mr. President, the Republican party will at its earliest opportunity seek the cooperation of leading nations in the coinage of silver, and will meantime aim to maintain the integrity of business affairs and the honor of the country by the maintenance of every dollar of money in the hands of the people, without depreciation, at its full face value.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont has alluded to the cheapness of the mining of silver. I did not care to interrupt the Senator in his speech, but I want to say to him that, while it is entirely true that we have mined silver in Colorado at 25 cents an ounce, it is equally true that we are now mining large quantities of gold at 25 cents an ounce, which is worth $20.67 at the mint.

As to the very remarkable mines which have been opened in what is called the Cripple Creek region, I am informed by the president of one of the largest companies that they have mined many thousands of dollars of gold that had cost them less than 25 cents an ounce. I was informed by an experienced engineer, a graduate of the Columbia College School of Mines, that he had examined the books of a mining company at Cripple Creek and he knew that very large amounts of gold were being mined in that mine at less than 25 cents an ounce. I called upon a gentleman who, from being a common laborer a few years ago, has become a man of vast wealth by mining gold, and he informed me that he was mining gold in his mine at 10 cents an ounce, and his foreman assured me that in three hours' work, with three men, he had taken out $4,000 in gold. I will venture to say there are more than twenty mines in Colorada to-day mining gold at less than a dollar an ounce. If that was silver, the Senator from Vermont, I suppose, would think it was a misfortune, but he will not so think when applied to gold.

We have heard a great deal about the silver barons, but we shall hear nothing about the gold barons, I suppose. I can select in the State of Colorado at least five men who were day laborers at three or four dollars a day, the poorest of whom has in five years from mining gold become worth a million dollars in hard money; one of them is worth at least, I should say now, five or six million dollars, and the others are proportionately wealthy.

Mr. MORRILL. But the usual complaint of the silver men is that there is a scarcity of gold, and that gold mines are no longer productive, so that a sufficient quantity of gold can not be produced.

Mr. TELLER. I am not discussing that question. It has been repeated again and again on this floor that silver should be coined at what it costs. Now, will the advocates of gold take the other horn, and say that gold shall be coined at what it costs? I do not contend for that. I always supposed it was the most foolish statement that could be made, and one not supported by logic or common sense, that the mint value of the precious metals depended upon what it cost to coin them. It is only in this Chamber that that heresy, fallacy, and absurdity has found a lodgment in the mind of any man.

Mr. President, I do not intend to debate the subject at this time. Some day I may present it if anybody desires that I shall, and I shall then present the evidence that thousands of dollars of gold have been mined in the last year in Colorado all the way from 10 cents to $10 an ounce, and any mine in Colorado that is supposed to be a rich and productive mine ought to yield gold at the rate of not above $15 an ounce.

I do not desire to mislead anybody when I speak of the vast profits from mining gold and sometimes from mining silver. I want to say that, while gold has been mined very cheaply in the mines to which I have referred, there are a thousand cases in this country where our people have expended fortunes in gold mining and have not made any money. While it is true that I have known a mine which produced silver at 25 cents an ounce, and even less than that, $400,000 was expended on that mine before any silver at all was taken out, and I believe from that mine its owners never took out enough silver to return the capital invested.

So it is not certain, even when a mine produces silver or gold very cheaply, that in the end the owner may not sink very much more money in it than he takes out. I believe it is a recognized fact in mining sections that more money is expended in mining than is received. Hundreds of miners work a lifetime without making any profit.

The man to whom I referred as having made a great fortune has mined in Colorado, I think I was told, for nearly thirty years without having made any profit. He has given his whole life to an effort to find a paying mine, and now when he has got to be a man of mature age, just about ready to depart from the stage of life, he has struck a very rich mine. It is the hope of being able to strike a rich mine which keeps up the mining industry in our country. It is a lottery, in which one man wins and hundreds lose, but you hear a great deal more about the one man who wins than the hundred who lose.

It is utterly impossible to fix the coinage rate of the precious metals by the cost of production. No man can say what it costs to produce the precious metals when taken in the aggregate. It is only when you have a mine which is rich, or a very poor mine, that you can say what mining costs. I have known silver mined very cheaply, as I have said, and I have known gold mined very cheaply. I have known a mine to pay $5 an ounce for every ounce of silver mined, and I have known a great many ounces of silver to cost the owner $100 an ounce or more. I have known three or four hundred thousand dollars to be put into a hole in the ground, and nothing to be taken out. These are the uncertainties of mining. What I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to is that the fact that some particular mine, the best mine perhaps in the world, was producing silver at 10, 15, or 25 cents an ounce has nothing to do with the question of minting, and neither he nor anybody else would propose to mint gold at less than the mint price of $20.67 to the ounce, because some fortunate man had produced it at 25 cents an ounce.

I have said in the Senate before, and I repeat it, that in the immediate neighborhood in which I live, in the early days, I have seen gold mined in great quantities for 5 cents an ounce. That was done in California and it has been done elsewhere, but when you sum up the total and give all the men who are laboring credit for their day's wages, and put against it all the gold and silver that are taken out, I believe it is pretty generally admitted that the labor account will exceed the gold account and the silver account.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I understand the pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. PALMER. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina may be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment reported by the committee by striking out section 4 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 4. That the issuance of interest-bearing bonds of the United States for any purpose whatever, without further authority of Congress, is hereby prohibited; and that the Secretary of the Treasury, when redeeming United States notes, commonly called greenbacks, and Treasury notes issued under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890, and when liquidating either the interest or principal of any of the Government's coin obligations, is hereby directed to make such payment in gold coin whenever the market value of 25.8 grains of standard gold is less than the market value of 412½ grains of standard silver, and to continue to pay in such gold coin until the maket value of 25.8 grains of standard gold shall be equal to the market value of 412½ grains of standard silver; but when the market value of 25.8 grains of standard gold shall be greater than the market value of 412½ grains of standard silver, he shall pay the interest and the principal of said coin obligations as they become due in silver coin, and continue to pay the same in silver coin until the market value of 412½ grains of standard silver shall be equal to the market value of 25.8 grains of standard gold; and said notes, commonly called greenbacks, when so redeemed, shall be reissued, as provided by the act of May 31, 1878.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment which has just been read, it provides that whenever the two metals part in parity gold shall be paid out instead of silver or instead of both indifferently. Several objections occur to my mind to this amendment. First, the very existence of such a provision in the law would create a factitious ground for efforts to make the two metals part in parity. A great motive would be engendered, a powerful force would be organized, an immense stimulus would be given to artificial efforts to create the very condition which we are seeking to prevent. Thus, if it were known that any departure in the parity of the two metals would lead to the payment of gold instead of silver, or instead of gold and silver indifferently, the very existence of that provision in the law would inspire those who might have their own interests to subserve to make a raid upon one metal or the other, and thus bring about what they desired, when they might not be able to bring it about if the law itself did not have that provision in it.

In the second place, it never has been within the power of law, it never can be within the power of law, to preserve an exact mathematical, continuous, and undeviating parity between the coins of both metals. This is true independent of what may be the metallic value of the commodity which composes them, for there are transient, spasmodic, and unanticipated causes which, at different places and at different times, just like the shock of an earthquake to the sphere that we live upon, will create aberrations in the value of the two metals, and that, as I say, independent of what may be the market value of the metal in its commodity form. For instance, at the very time when the Sherman law was repealed in the autumn of 1893 the metallic silver dollars were selling in the marts of New York and in the marts of Richmond for a premium ranging from 3 to 5 per cent. Although the metallic substance in the silver dollar was much below the par of the metallic substance in the gold dollar, the silver coin was selling at a premium over the gold coin, for the reason that at that time there was a peculiar and transient and a spasmodic demand for those denominations to be found in the silver coin and not to be found in the gold coin. This was a case in which, it will be observed, the lower metal was bringing the premium over the higher because coins in those low denominations which were in demand——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Virginia that his five minutes have expired.

Mr. DANIEL. Very well, Mr. President.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I should have asked the Senator from Virginia to allow me an interruption if I had not known that he was speaking under the five-minute rule, in order to correct what seems to me to be a mistake on his part as to the purport of this amendment as I read it. As I read the amendment of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, it is not that silver shall be paid for the obligations of the Government whenever there is a difference in the parity of the two metals, but it is that whenever the parity has disappeared, and there is a difference in the commercial value of the two metals, that coin shall be paid in the discharge of public obligations which is the less valuable in the markets of the world, whether it be gold or whether it be silver. I do not think the Senator from Virginia apprehended the trend of the amendment in that respect. So the amendment is obnoxious, it seems to me, to the criticism which the Senator from Virginia did not make, of course, with his apprehension of the scope of the amendment, that here is an advertisement in advance by the Government, if this amendment should become law, that, however the state of the market may be with reference to the bullion which composes the coins of gold or silver, all that the public creditor can expect is to be paid in the cheapest, whichever it may be, and, while it was not intended, the practical effect would be that in any event "we are bound to cheat you if we can."

Mr. President, what is the necessity for such an amendment as that? Why should those who are asked to loan money to the Government be told in advance, no matter how low the rate of interest they are willing to take or are asked to take, that in the future, if there shall be, from any of the great economic causes which control the price of commodities which are made into the metal moneys of the world, differences between the prices of these metals, they shall be paid in that which has suffered the most from whatever financial cataclysm shall take place? I do not believe that on any ground such an amendment can commend itself to the common sense, the honesty, or the sense of fairness of the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. May I be indulged to make a few remarks, as I see I did misapprehend the amendment? I ask unanimous consent to be heard.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. DANIEL. I thought from my hearing of the reading of the amendment that it is one which requires the preference to be given to the higher metal. I perceive upon explanation that it requires the preference to be made by the Government in paying out the lower metal; and while this misapprehension of facts as to the meaning of the amendment guided my remarks, the same philosophy applies to this that would apply to the other.

It would not be right to provide that in any and all events the lower metal should be paid out, for that would create in a different line the same exterior interest and force to make the metals go apart. The true idea, as I conceive, is that in the administration of the law the power intrusted with the discretion should leave the matter entirely unknown to the person seeking payment as to which metal he would get. If the party going to a counter to receive payment knows that by indicating one metal he may demand that and thus deprive the Government of its option to pay in either, the preference of the outsider will always be directed to demand payment in the higher metal, and consequently by that artificial demand will increase the premium on the very metal which it should be the policy of the law to balance with the other. But if, on the other hand, before he goes to the counter to receive either metal, he is in doubt as to which he will get, he will have no motive to run down either, but a disposition to maintain that both are good, because he may get either. Therefore, for the like philosophy which would actuate me to oppose the amendment if it read as I understood it, I am obliged to oppose it as I now see it reads.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Virginia a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.

Mr. BUTLER. What does the Senator understand to be the purpose and meaning of the law which now invests the Secretary of the Treasury with the option of paying our coin obligations in either metal? What is the purpose of that law?

Mr. DANIEL. To allow the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out either metal.

Mr. GRAY. There is no such law.

Mr. DANIEL. There is such a law, I believe. As to the Sherman notes there is such a law. There is such a law.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. The object of that option, as I would conceive if I am put in the position of an interpreter, would be that the Secretary of the Treasury might exercise the discretion to select that metal in paying out which would best preserve the parity of both metals.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the object is to preserve the parity?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. How can he preserve the parity? What is the practical operation now that he must go through with in order to preserve the parity?

Mr. DANIEL. He can best preserve the parity by not letting it be known and by having no fixed rule made by which he would select the one or the other metal, so as to leave those who receive payment in doubt as to which metal they will get, and therefore without a motive to run down the other metal.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Virginia will pardon me. He does not meet my question squarely. In which metal should he pay? I am not asking about the discretion. In order to maintain the parity, which metal, in the Senator's judgment, should the Secretary of the Treasury pay out when he is called upon to pay out on coin obligations? Should he pay out the metal already at a premium, above par, or should he pay the one that should be brought up to a parity with the other?

Mr. DANIEL. I think he should treat them so indifferently as always to leave the outsider in doubt as to which metal he would get, paying one to-day and the other to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not the question.

Mr. DANIEL. I can not permit the Senator to ask me a question and also to give the answer. I am giving my answer.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will pardon me when I say that I do not think he understands the question.

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. BUTLER. Or the Senator would not have given me the answer which he has given me.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not think the Senator understands the answer, if he will permit me.

Mr. BUTLER. I think I do understand the Senator's answer, but I think it is such an answer that it leaves the Secretary of the Treasury with a cloak to violate the law as he is doing now; and certainly the Senator from Virginia does not want him to do that.

Mr. DANIEL. I am not undertaking, in speaking to an amendment, to go into all the details or to criticise or to commend the Secretary of the Treasury. I am merely trying to get at the abstract philosophy and the truth which should preside over any general principles of administration. I would give my answer so plain that everyone could comprehend it; and that is, in selecting a metal to pay out the Secretary of the Treasury should be guided by a discretion governed by the conditions and circumstances at the time existing, and should pay out that metal which, in his judgment, would best preserve the parity of the two metals.

If he thought it would best preserve the parity of the two metals to pay out the cheaper he should pay out the cheaper. If he thought at the moment that to be indiscriminate and indifferent about it and so to select the metals that he would keep it perpetually unknown which the person seeking payment would get, he would select the other. But you can no more lay down a fixed statutory principle which would control that discretion than you can tell a military commander under the batteries and fire of an enemy what command he should give to his troops at this moment or that. It belongs to the elasticity of mental operation applied to a miscellaneous, shifting, and ever-changeable condition of facts.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator say whether he thinks the Secretary of the Treasury in using that elastic discretion for the varying conditions—for they have been varying—has succeeded in maintaining a parity, or has approached it by the way he has been paying our coin obligations?

Mr. DANIEL. All the records will answer that question without my being put upon the witness stand. It is evident that the parity between the two metals has not been maintained.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator think that the action of the Secretary of the Treasury has tended to cause a disparity?

Mr. DANIEL. When I desire to express my opinion upon that subject I prefer to do so upon an occasion when I am unrestrained by time and when it is apropos of the matter in debate. As to that question, which has no application to this amendment, I beg leave to say that I decline to answer.

Mr. BUTLER. This amendment never would have been offered if the spirit and the letter of the law had been used to maintain a parity. We have seen day after day that gold has been preferred and paid out on the coin obligations of the Government, and the disparity has grown greater under it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The five-minute rule is in operation, the Chair will state to the Senate.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I will state that, while I should be glad to oblige every Senator on this floor, I shall feel from this time henceforward compelled to object to any variation or modification of the consent agreement made on yesterday.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, of course as long as silver coinage is limited and as the ratio between gold and silver coin differs in bullion value, a condition like that we now have will continue to exist, and if it does continue to exist there might be some pertinency in the proposed amendment. But I understand the logic of those who favor the unlimited coinage of silver at 16 to 1 is that the moment we come to that kind of coinage the difference in the bullion value of gold and silver will cease; that silver will appreciate in value or gold depreciate in value until a mean value will be found, and that the action of the Government of the United States in going to the free coinage of silver at the present ratio will so enhance the demand for silver as to bring the value of the two metals together.

If that be true there will be no necessity for any such amendment as the one now offered. There will be no time when the Secretary of the Treasury can pay out silver because silver bullion is below the value of gold bullion, and no time when gold bullion will be paid out because it is below the value of silver bullion. Therefore I suggest to my friend from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] that if the logic of his position is a logic that can be relied upon, the amendment ought to be defeated, because it is inconsistent with the very theory of those who insist upon the free coinage of silver.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to have an opportunity to close the debate. If there are any others who wish to speak, I will yield, as I desire to close the discussion on the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, there are a great many questions, of course, connected with the main proposition intended to be covered by the pending bill which are meritorious in themselves. When the committee were formulating their substitute they discussed many collateral questions about which we should have been glad to express an opinion or to have proposed legislation, but the main, the leading purpose of this bill is to provide for the unlimited coinage of silver. While there are many other things that it would be well to provide for, the committee were of opinion, or at least those members who sympathize with my views were of opinion, that it would be best not to complicate this question with any of the others.

The suggestions which have just been discussed on the floor of the Senate seem to me to be really irrelevant to the matter in hand, and I hope that the Senate will be willing to pass the amendment as it came from the committee, without adding any additional amendments. Without entering into a discussion of the merits of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, I hope the Senate will not adopt any amendments to the amendment reported to the bill, but that it will pass the bill as it came from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it seems to me from my standpoint that if we can adopt the committee's amendment it will cover the whole ground; and I appeal to our friends who believe in supporting that amendment to let us come to a vote on it and not on this amendment. Several of these amendments would be very appropriate and proper if we did not have free coinage. If we get that we shall not need them. If we do not get free coinage, we can put the amendments on some other bill or somewhere else. I think free coinage covers the whole ground, solves the whole question, and settles all these amendments and the propositions contained in them.

I believe it would be better for us if we should not put such amendments upon a free-coinage bill. Some of them would not be harmonious with it. I do not like to vote against any amendment which looks like it would do something for the country, but at the same time I believe that the whole is greater than a part, and free coinage is greater than any of the amendments.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I regret very much to see the friends of free coinage weakening at this time. The amendment which has been offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is clearly in the line of restoring the parity between the two coins. The present so-called Sherman law of 1890 vests in the Secretary of the Treasury a discretion to redeem the notes under that act in either gold or silver coin. He has studiously and sedulously refused to carry out the discretion placed in him by that act, and by that means has caused the disparity which now exists between gold and silver.

The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is to the effect that whenever there is disparity between the two metals that disparity shall be restored by the action of the Treasury Department in paying out that metal or that coin whose bullion value is of the lower character or the less valuable in the market.

I do not now propose to discuss the question which we have discussed here for two or three years as to what is parity and how it is to be restored. I think the advocates of silver all along on both sides have agreed that there can be no natural parity between gold and silver as bullion, as articles of commodity, especially when one is unrestricted in its coinage and the other limited in its coinage. It is all idle, it is the worst kind of logical rot to claim that a parity can exist or be restored between the two metals under those circumstances.

Mr. DUBOIS. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. Does the Senator think that if we secured the unlimited coinage of silver we would then have a parity between the two metals?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly. Why not?

Mr. DUBOIS. That is the proposition.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

Mr. DUBOIS. Then what is the use of adding an amendment to secure that parity when you have a chance to vote for the unlimited coinage of silver?

Mr. ALLEN. Not at all, because I am well satisfied in my own mind that the amendment of the committee as reported will be absolutely ignored and violated in its execution unless the principle be couched in words which can not be avoided.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLEN. We have had too much experience——

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to make a suggestion at this point?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], who, I believe, does not favor free coinage, made the same observation about this matter as that made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who favors it. I wish to say here—the Senator is coming to it, if he will pardon me—that it is perfectly clear, it seems to me, that free coinage will not maintain the parity unless the Secretary of the Treasury carries out the spirit and intent of the law in paying out the metals so as to maintain it. Besides, you must remember that there are to-day millions of gold mortgages in this country which were authorized under the Bland-Allison Act, and so long as they exist there will be an artificial strain on gold, and free coinage can not maintain the parity unless the provisions of the proposed act are carried out by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALLEN. I am well persuaded that is true, and therefore I favor the amendment.

Now, just one more observation, and I hope my time may be extended sufficiently to make it. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] expresses the hope that no amendments will be offered to the bill as it is now proposed to be amended by the committee. What earthly use is there in adopting the amendment of the committee and sending this law to the Treasury Department to execute without some restrictions upon the Treasury Department in the issuance of Government bonds? I ask the honorable Senator from Colorado if we have not had experience enough with this Administration to know that by every contortion of language, and by the absolute violation of the letter and spirit of the law, this matter will not be carried out if there is a possibility of avoiding it, and the money will be supplied just as it is supplied to-day by the issuance of Government bonds?

Now, why not put upon this bill an amendment that will prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from issuing another interest-bearing obligation of the Government unless the necessity is declared by Congress.

Mr. TELLER. If I may answer the Senator, I will say, taking the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, where it provides that there shall be no further issuing of interest-bearing bonds, I am prepared to vote for that amendment. I do not know that every friend of free coinage is; and I would rather get a vote on free coinage simply and alone, and then if we want to add to the provision any of these things—and some of them, I think, might then be properly added—let us add them to the bill. What I desire is that we may have a fair and square vote on the question of free coinage unencumbered by anything else. Of course I do not mean to say that many of these amendments would not meet my approval on the bill after we had voted for free coinage. I am in favor——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. TELLER. I am in favor of restricting the issue of bonds by positive law.

Mr. WALTHALL rose.

Mr. HARRIS. The substitute provides for free coinage, pure and simple, and while there has been notice given of a number of amendments dealing with the various refinements, and sometimes with other questions, more or less pertinent and germane, I wish to reach a vote upon the amendment reported by the committee just as it is, and I shall oppose all amendments, regardless of their refinements or such merit as they may possess. I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina on the table.

Mr. ALLEN. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Tennessee will withdraw that motion, for I want five minutes on the amendment before the vote is taken.

Mr. HARRIS. For the purpose of allowing the Senator from North Carolina to be heard under the consent rule, I will withdraw the motion, but I shall renew it as soon as the Senator has been heard, if I can get the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was addressed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] before the Senator from North Carolina rose.

Mr. WALTHALL. I simply rose to make the same motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I trust that the disposition of some to try to table this amendment will not prevail. It should be discussed, and besides every Senator ought to be willing to go squarely on record upon a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. PRITCHARD and others. We will.

Mr. BUTLER. All right. The first section of this amendment is germane to the bill that came from the other House. It provides that no more bonds shall be issued by the President for any purpose without the consent and advice of Congress. We have not done our duty by simply killing the bond bill passed by the House, for every Senator on this floor knows that the President will continue to issue the bonds under the old Republican law of 1875. Therefore, if you are opposed to bonds, you must not only refuse to pass this new bond bill, but you must also repeal the law under which the President has already issued $262,000,000 of interest-bearing bonds. I claim that the law of 1875 does not give him this power, but since he is assuming that power right under the nose and in the teeth of Congress, we should pass this amendment at once, which positively prohibits the further issuance of bonds without authority of Congress. The man who does not vote for this amendment says by his vote that he is willing for the President to continue the bonds deals, which have not only been disgraceful, but which have piled up a large interest-bearing debt upon our taxpayers, with nothing to show for it. It has all been done for the sole benefit of gold gamblers and speculators. Will we sit here and permit such robbery to continue? Let us vote for this amendment and stop it.

The second half of my amendment is germane to the free-silver amendment reported by the committee. I want to speak frankly as a man who favors free coinage as a great and fundamental principle of sound finance. I am not from a silver-producing State. I care nothing about the gold barons or the silver barons. I am from an agricultural State and an agricultural section of the country. Our prosperity and the prosperity of all wealth producers depends upon the amount of full legal-tender money in circulation. We do not care if all the money is gold coin, provided there is enough gold, but we all know that there is not enough of both gold and silver if every ounce was coined into money. It does not make any difference with us whether gold is dug from the mines at a cost of 10 cents an ounce or 5 cents an ounce. We all know that gold is now being mined at many places at a cost of less than 5 cents for the amount of gold that the Government stamps and calls a dollar. It costs more than that to mine the amount of silver that is in a silver dollar. Every man of common sense knows that the cost of digging these metals from the earth has practically nothing to do with the money value of the metals. That depends upon and is regulated by law and the stamp of the Government. I am not directly interested in the price of silver or the price of gold as metals, but I am interested and every wealth producer is directly interested in the amount of these that are coined into full legal-tender dollars. But it is necessary to bring about a parity between the two metals so as to overcome the difference in exchange between the Orient and the Occident. This can be done only by having the same law to apply to both metals. There must be free coinage for both and an equal strain on or demand for both.

Mr. President, as heartily as I favor free coinage, I say to-day, and I will repeat it every time such a bill is up, that I never want to see a free-coinage bill become a law until this amendment or some provision similar to it becomes a law with it. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], who is a gold man, shrewdly sees the point. He knows that if a free-coinage bill were to become a law to-day that the Secretary of the Treasury could cause a disparity between the metals by paying out gold alone on our coin obligations as he has been doing and is now doing. Besides, there was a clause put into the Bland-Allison Act of 1878 which allowed mortgages and notes to be taken payable in gold. There are thousands and millions of dollars to-day due in every section of this country on such gold mortgages and notes. This was done to appreciate gold and to depreciate silver. Now, the Government, to maintain the parity between the two metals, must pay out silver on our coin obligations until the strain on silver is equal to the strain on gold.

Then and then only will there be a parity. This is what the Secretary ought to do now. It is his option and duty under the law to do it, but he is not doing it. He is causing a greater disparity by putting a still greater strain on gold. Hence the necessity of this amendment, which directs him in express terms how to maintain the parity. If we pass a free-coinage bill with this provision, then silver and gold will always practically be of the same bullion value. If you do not, then the Secretary of the Treasury will continue to discriminate against silver to cause a disparity. Then every gold organ in this country would howl from ocean to ocean that free coinage had not produced a parity, and that the Senator from Colorado and others who favor free coinage had not told the truth. They would show that what we had promised had not come. They would start a fresh campaign to fool the people and get them to submit to a gold standard by taking advantage of their own wrong and our indiscretion. No true friend of silver can want to see a free-coinage bill passed unless there goes with it a provision that will force the execution of the law in good faith. If you leave the Secretary of the Treasury with the discretion which he now has, he can and will discriminate against silver and in favor of gold. There is no way to maintain the parity but to stop and prevent this discrimination. Certainly we do not want to give the gold men an opportunity to rob us of some of the benefits of free coinage, and at the same time furnish them with fresh demagogy with which to fool the people.

The great agricultural section wants free coinage of gold and silver and also a parity between these metals, because it wants a bimetallic standard and more full legal-tender dollars. We want enough money to maintain stability of prices, and we want to correct the difference of exchange between silver and gold using countries, so that our farmers and manufacturers can successfully compete with the balance of the world. We have a wily foe to fight; and I tell you if you vote down my amendment and do not place such a provision upon the bill, every free-coinage man here will be put on the defensive before the gold advocates. That is the gospel truth about it.

The gold men try to chide us by saying that we favor paying our coin obligations in the cheaper metal. How, under heaven, can you ever pay out the coins so as to maintain a parity if you always pay in the dearer metal? It is absurd. Every man knows that you can not maintain the parity without putting an equal strain on both metals. When too great a strain has been put on gold, it goes to a premium. If you continue the strain, the premium goes higher. But take the strain off of gold and put it on silver and they at once come to a parity. Therefore we should pay in silver when gold is at a premium. It is absolutely necessary to do it. The Senator from Delaware says that this is robbing the bondholder.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Delaware said nothing of the kind.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood him to say so. My amendment provides for paying the bondholder exactly in accordance with the contract. To pay him in gold only is to rob the farmer and all the people who pay the taxes.

Mr. GRAY. It will rob the farmer more than it will rob the bondholder.

Mr. HARRIS. I renew my motion.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator to withdraw it for one moment. I shall not occupy any time.

Mr. HARRIS. I can not resist the appeal of the Senator from Georgia. I regret that he makes it, however.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. BACON. I only make it that my vote on this amendment may not be misconstrued. The first clause in the amendment I favor, and I favor it so strongly that I do not feel that I can cast a vote against it without giving my reason therefor. I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina only because of that part which relates to the payment of gold obligations by the Treasury. I do favor the first clause, which prohibits the issuance of bonds by any executive officer without authority of Congress.

I desire to say before taking my seat, in order that I may not be further misunderstood, that I do not agree with the Senator from North Carolina that the restoration of free coinage will not produce parity. I believe it will produce parity. Otherwise I should not favor it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not insist upon his motion to lay the amendment upon the table. Let us vote it down. There has been no greater obstacle to the restoration of the free silver dollar to the place it occupied before the crime of 1873 than the effort to get more than could be obtained when legislation was before Congress. Now, we can secure here, beyond peradventure, the free and unlimited coinage of the silver dollar, its restoration to the place it occupied in our laws before it was demonetized in 1873. Let us take that. The propositions of the Senator from North Carolina I favor, and when the appropriate time comes for voting for them I shall vote for them; but this is neither the time nor the place, in my humble judgment. I hope that the Senator from Tennessee will let us take a yea-and-nay vote and vote down the amendments. We can do it as quickly in that way as we can in the other.

Mr. STEWART. The amendment is still open for discussion? No motion has yet been made to lay it on the table, I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nevada upon the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I think the amendment is proper on the bill now under consideration. This is simply a bill upon which the Senate are going to vote their sentiments. There is no expectation that it will become a law. There is no expectation that we shall get free coinage. It is very doubtful if it will ever be considered by anybody after it leaves the Senate. It is simply an opportunity for men to vote their sentiments. We are now just maneuvering for position. It is giving those who want to parade before the country as friends of silver an opportunity to vote for it. They can do it now without hurting the Rothschilds or anybody else, because they know the bill will not become a law. It is the most harmless bill in the world.

If there is any sentiment that I have which is stronger than any other it is opposition to loading this Government with interest-bearing bonds in time of peace. That is the issue between the people and the two parties. Both the Democratic and the Republican parties are thoroughly committed to the principle of loading this country with interest-bearing bonds in time of peace.

This bill came here from a Republican House, and it was thought so important that this indorsement of the issuing of bonds should be made that we were not allowed to take the usual holiday recess. The Republican party and the Democratic party are both in favor of interest-bearing bonds in time of peace. The Populist party is opposed to it. There is no necessity for it. It is wicked to do it. There is no demand for issuing bonds whatever, as we have discussed and shown repeatedly.

I hope no Senator will move to lay the amendment on the table, but that there will be a direct vote on this proposition. I think we ought to have a direct vote on this matter—on the policy of issuing bonds—and hope no motion will be made to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am opposed to the issuance of bonds, but I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if, when we substitute an unlimited coinage bill for a bond issue, we are not voting directly against the authorization of bonds of any kind? That is the proposition here. We are substituting a free-coinage amendment for a proposition to issue bonds.

Mr. STEWART. Will you allow me to answer? We are simply on dress parade as voting our sentiments. We know very well that the free-coinage bill is not to become a law. I think it important for the Senate to be recorded in opposition to bonds. If that be the sentiment of Congress it may have some effect in checking these very wicked processes. This is merely voting a sentiment.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to ask a question?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. By voting for this free-coinage bill you do not repeal the law that President Cleveland is now issuing bonds under. He is now issuing bonds.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator is talking about another proposition, not the one under consideration.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to repeal the law, for if we do not repeal it he will continue to issue bonds.

Mr. STEWART. Of course this measure will not interfere with the President's doing anything. It is not to become a law. It is simply voting the sentiments of Congress, and if there is any sentiment against the issue of bonds let it be manifested here. Every time there is an opportunity we ought to protest against the issuing of bonds in any form. That ought to be done if a majority is opposed to the issuance of bonds.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to explain my vote on the pending amendment. I shall vote for the substitute reported by the committee. I am in favor of prohibiting the issuing of bonds without the action of Congress. I am also in favor of requiring the payment of gold and silver coin by the Treasury as may be required to meet the obligations of the Government without preference of either, except as temporary exigencies may require one or the other. But there are matters in this amendment which will create difference of opinion, and they had better come up separately. For myself, I believe that when the law says two things shall be equal for the payment of private and public obligations there is no power in the world that can make them unequal. For that purpose that is all the parity that is possible to exist. The other may come from other causes, and it is not in any wise material to free coinage of silver that the market value of the metals shall be equal to the ratio established by Congress. Now, we have a difference of opinion. I am with the Senator from North Carolina upon these chief propositions. I am in favor of the equal payment of gold and silver by positive requirement and prohibition of law. But I prefer not to vote for the pending amendment.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, just one word. Our experience ever since 1873 has been that the executive officers of the Government absolutely refuse to execute the law. They are doing it now and have been doing it continuously, and they propose to do it until there is a mandatory provision requiring them to execute the law. That is the principal reason why I favor the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. It makes it obligatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury to obey the written law, and until we have some such statute we shall have no execution of it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I ask permission to state to the Senate what it seems to me the Senator from North Carolina has lost sight of. I tried to make him understand me, but of course that could not be done in a moment, and he was on the floor. The Senator from North Carolina moves to amend the second section of the original bill. Suppose that is put in, and there is no other amendment. The next movement is the recommendation of the committee to strike off the whole bill, and the proposition will be to strike out the whole bill as amended.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. Wait a moment, until I get through. Then, if we carry the free coinage we have stricken out the whole thing as amended, we have undone what we had just done. It seems to me logically that the Senator must wait until we dispose of the committee amendment, and then let it come in as a separate section with an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator has been misrepresented by the printed slip on the table. I saw the force of that, and when I offered the amendment proper, as shown in the RECORD of January 14, I offered it in the place of section 4 of the report of the committee. Therefore it is an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee. It is a substitute for section 4.

Mr. HALE. It is an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. BUTLER. It is just an amendment to the substitute, where it is peculiarly appropriate. If we are going to vote on free coinage let us vote on a measure that is sound and will give relief if we ever get free coinage. We know it is not going to become a law; but when we say what will give relief let us say what is honest.

Mr. TELLER. That changes the attitude of the amendment very much. I had supposed it was as I have it in the printed form.

Mr. BUTLER. I corrected that.

Mr. TELLER. That is certainly an attempt on the Senator's part to amend and correct the report of the committee as to section 4. I have not seen any print of that kind.

Mr. BUTLER. It has not been printed.

Mr. TELLER. Then the proposition now is to amend section 4 by the Senator's substitute?

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, we can not hear at all on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. TELLER. What I said was that, as I now understand from the explanation of the Senator from North Carolina, instead of the amendment being to the text of the bill, it is an amendment to the committee's amendment, which is section 4. That, of course, changes the parliamentary status entirely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. STEWART called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHILTON. Let the amendment be again read.

Mr. FRYE. Was there not an amendment pending offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to that part of the bill proposed to be stricken out by the committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is not so advised. The Senator from Texas calls for the reading of the amendment to the amendment, which will be done.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. BUTLER to section 4 of the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have section 4 of the substitute, which is proposed to be stricken out, read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The section referred to will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem the United States notes, commonly called "greenbacks," and also the Treasury notes issued under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890, when presented for redemption in standard silver dollars or in gold coin, using for redemption of said notes either gold or silver coins, or both, not at the option of the holder, but exclusively at the option of the Treasury Department, and said notes, commonly called "greenbacks," when so redeemed, shall be reissued as provided by the act of May 31, 1878.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. CULLOM'S name was called). The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] has a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], but on all questions relating to this bill a transfer has been made whereby the Senator from Illinois stands paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], who has a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], who is called home to attend a funeral in his family. If the Senator from New Jersey were present, he would at any rate vote against the committee substitute—the unlimited-coinage provision—and I think he would vote against all amendments to the bill; but I do not feel at liberty to vote now unless some Senator on the other side of the Chamber can assure me that the Senator from New Jersey would vote against the pending amendment.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from New Jersey before he left called my attention to the fact of his pair with the Senator from Idaho; and, without disclosing exactly what he said, I will say that I think the Senator from New Jersey did not expect the Senator from Idaho to vote on anything pertaining to the bill in the absence of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator thinks I should not vote?

Mr. HILL. I think so.

Mr. DUBOIS. I thought perhaps we might agree on this question and vote the same way.

Mr. HILL. The precise effect of this amendment upon the state of the bill might be uncertain, and therefore I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that he should not vote.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well. Of course I expect to observe my pair strictly.

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. I do not see him in his seat, and I ask his colleague how he would vote on this question?

Mr. BACON. I am not prepared to answer the question, as my colleague did not give me any information on the subject before he left.

Mr. GEAR. Then I withhold my vote; but if I were not paired I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], who is absent on important business; but as he and I agree on this question, I vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. Can his colleague inform me how he would vote on this question? Perhaps we might vote the same way.

Mr. CAMERON. I think my colleague, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN. Then I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], and vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT], who is unavoidably detained from the Chamber, is paired on all these questions with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE].

Mr. BURROWS (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY]. I voted on this question under an impression—and that impression has been confirmed—that if present he would vote the same way that I have done. If there be no objection to that, I will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—13.

Allen,	Cannon,	Kyle,	Roach,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLEN. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk, to be added to section 4 of the committee amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed at the close of section 4 of the committee amendment to add the following:

Provided, That after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall be deprived of the power to issue the bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of the Government unless Congress shall first declare the necessity therefor, any act of Congress now in force to the contrary notwithstanding.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. I am in favor of restricting the Treasury Department from issuing any bonds. I desire to do that, however, in a separate section after we have disposed of the other amendments. I am prepared to vote for such an amendment, but I do not like to vote for it at this time in this particular shape. I appeal to the Senator from Nebraska to wait and see if we can not afterwards put such a provision on the bill with proper deliberation. I believe if we can do it, it will be an expression of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I can not see anything to be gained by withdrawing the amendment at this time. If the Senator can explain to my satisfaction—and I am very easily satisfied—why this amendment should not be attached to this section, and why it should be made a separate section, I will willingly comply with his request.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know that it is necessary that it should be made a separate section. I thought I rather liked the form of the proposition, as it came from the Senator from North Carolina, a little better than the language of the substitute, and I thought we might have an opportunity to put it in better shape.

I want it distinctly understood that however I may vote upon this question, I am determinedly opposed to the issue of bonds by the Government of the United States in time of peace or at any other time, except as authorized so to do specifically by Congress. I am in favor of taking away that power if it exists. I am exceedingly anxious that we may have a fair vote on that question, unencumbered by the free-coinage question. It seems to me that we might have that, and that we might determine this other question in the Senate, as we know we all have a right to do, when the bill is reported to the Senate. Should the Senator introduce his amendment in the Senate after we have disposed of the committee amendment, I should have no hesitation in voting for it as I am now advised. If it is not presented in any better form, I shall certainly vote for it as it stands, and cheerfully and gladly vote for it. I merely thought we had better take one thing at a time, and not complicate the main issue and the main question by any of these other questions until that shall have been disposed of.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I wish to say that I am decidedly in favor of the proposition contained in the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] or the same proposition contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]; but I am opposed to voting for that amendment to the amendment of the Committee on Finance. I am willing to vote for either one of the amendments to the bill when I can do so as a separate proposition. After we shall have passed upon the question as to whether or not the committee amendment shall be voted up or voted down, then, if this proposition shall be renewed as an amendment to the bill as amended, I stand ready and willing and anxious to vote for it, because I do not believe the Secretary of the Treasury should have a standing power to issue bonds at his own discretion. I think he should only have the power when an emergency arises and the power is given by Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado a question, the answer to which will control my vote on this proposition. Does the Senator from Colorado think that the adoption at this particular time of the amendment to the amendment would in any way impair or injure the chances of the passage by the Senate of a measure for the free coinage of silver?

Mr. TELLER. If I may be allowed to answer, I will state that I do not say that it will have that effect. I have been afraid that it might make some difference with some members of the Senate, and I felt that we had better settle the main question first, the importance of which we all recognize.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I believe it will lose votes for the substitute.

Mr. GEORGE. Has the Senator from Colorado a serious apprehension that such will be the result?

Mr. TELLER. If I had not, being very much in favor of the principle, I certainly should not have subjected myself to the danger of being misunderstood by voting against it. If I believed it would help the free-coinage provision I should have voted for it very cheerfully. I shall certainly vote for it after we have disposed of the main question.

Mr. GEORGE. Then, Mr. President, upon the judgment of so able a Senator as the Senator from Colorado, being, however, in favor of the amendment and being determined to vote for a similar proposition somewhere in this bill, in order not to cripple in any way or to impair the passage of a free-coinage bill, I will vote against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I wish to say a word or two on this subject, because it is one that concerns the interests of the whole country. In the first place, I am in favor of the free coinage of silver as a principle. I propose to vote in accordance with that conviction. I do not think it necessary that we should spend so much time in discussing the silver question here, except to show to the American people what the views of the American Senate are on that subject. Certainly nothing can be accomplished at this session in the way of legislation in favor of silver. That is already well understood. However, it is needful and proper that we should put ourselves on record as to where we stand on the question. The position I occupy is in favor of silver.

Now, when it comes to the other matter, the question of the issuance of bonds by this Administration or by any other, I take a different position from that of some of my friends who are in favor of the restoration of silver. I want to say that I am not afraid to have bonds issued if it is needful to borrow money to carry on the legitimate operations of the Government or provide for an emergency. I believe in sustaining the Government, first by the methods familiar to us all, taxation first, and customs taxation principally, supplementing it with internal-revenue taxation, but depending mainly upon customs duties, to be so levied as incidentally to protect American interests. I believe that it is wrong for us to deny to the people of the United States the revenue that ought to be secured from properly imposed taxation upon imports. I believe that this Government should have its coffers well supplied with the necessary funds with which to carry on the Government obtained from this source mainly.

But, Mr. President, I am also in favor of carrying on the Government and of sustaining its credit. I am in favor of carrying on all the great public works which have already been started and others that should be started as speedily as possible. I am in favor, for example, of the construction of the Nicaragua Canal. I am in favor of coast defenses for our country. I think we are indulging in criminal negligence, if I may properly use such an expression in this presence, by our failure to provide an adequate system of coast defenses for this country. The greatest military authorities of this country and the greatest naval authorities agree that we are in a perilous condition, and that it will take time to put ourselves in a proper state to resist an attack and to maintain the dignity of this country, if need be, in connection with our foreign affairs.

Therefore I wish to state at this time that I shall vote against such an amendment as is here proposed, because I am willing to support the hands of the present Administration in its effort to maintain the credit of the Government on the one hand, and I am in favor of the issuance of bonds whenever necessary to obtain funds that can not properly be obtained in sufficient quantity by taxation to carry on the great and necessary work for the development and protection of our country.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] I think should be withdrawn, with all due deference to him. We do not know the views of every Senator upon this floor on all branches of this question, and there may be Senators who are in favor of the amendment proposed by the committee who would not support the proposition advanced by the Senator from Nebraska; and yet his amendment may be adopted. Senators who take the view of the Senator from New York, for instance, as evidenced by this last vote, may think it desirable to load the substitute of the committee with what might be called Grecian amendments. Gifts of this character may result in defeating the amendment proposed by the committee.

It is obviously the duty of those who agree upon the free-coinage proposition to dissever the subject from all others, and, presenting that unembarrassed, vote upon it, and not run the risk of losing the support of those who, while desiring free coinage, would be loath to adopt the extreme proposition advocated by the Senator from Nebraska. I do not speak of this because personally I am opposed to the amendment; on the contrary, I am in favor of restricting the issuance of bonds; but I do not wish to go into that subject or to trench upon the views of other Senators who, as I said awhile ago, favoring the amendment of the committee, might possibly object to that proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I desire to state very briefly that the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives does not meet with my approval. Neither does the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance. I shall vote for the amendment of the Committee on Finance as a substitute for the bill of the House in order to defeat the bill of the House. I believe that if the bill as it came from the other House should pass this body it would become a law. I am perfectly satisfied that if the Senate substitute passes this body neither will become a law. Therefore I shall vote for the amendment, as I suppose my friend from New York did, as he is at least charged with having done; in order to defeat one part of it I shall vote for any amendment that will defeat the other.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I wish to state that I favor both the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] and that of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. I think, however, that it may endanger the bill to encumber and embarrass it by such amendments. While I feel that I want the time to come when I can vote for the principles enunciated in the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, as well as that of the Senator from Nebraska, I shall vote against the proposition at this time, but hoping that I shall yet have an opportunity to vote for it, for I favor it.

I am opposed to the issuance of bonds in time of peace, or that the Secretary of the Treasury should have authority to issue bonds. I am as absolutely of that conviction as is the Senator who proposes the amendment. Yet at the same time I think it is best for us not to encumber the bill. It is good as it is, and I wish to see it go through. Then after that we can put on these amendments if it is necessary. I favor the bill as it is proposed to be amended by the committee, as I have before stated, and therefore I shall vote in the way I have indicated.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, it is extremely curious to me to find gentlemen who claim to be in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver unwilling to follow the policy to its logical consequence. It is a strange thing to me that a proposition coming from the representatives of the only great party in this country which in 1892 declared in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at 16 to 1 should be regarded by the friends of free silver as Greek gifts, coming ostensibly friendly but really hostile to the object to be accomplished.

Senators say that they are ready to vote for an amendment similar to this. At what time? If the amendment be right, why not vote for it now?

Mr. BATE. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky a question?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. BATE. Will the Senator from Kentucky vote for this amendment when the time comes?

Mr. LINDSAY. I shall vote for the amendment in order to make a logical bill.

Mr. BATE. Ah!

Mr. LINDSAY. And then, believing the amendment to be wrong, I shall vote against the amendment as amended.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Kentucky will vote for it when it can not pass.

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes; and I will state that in all the history of the agitation for the free coinage of silver it has always been pressed when such a bill could not pass and never when there was an opportunity to pass it.

Mr. ALLEN. That is true.

Mr. LINDSAY. Never when there was an opportunity to pass such a measure has there been any serious attempt to pass it.

Now, the claim of the friends of free silver is that it will restore prosperity; that it will operate to revive business; that the Treasury will be full to overflowing with legal-tender money, and we will need no bonds.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question? At what time since 1873 has there been an opportunity to pass a free-coinage bill?

Mr. LINDSAY. There was an opportunity in 1890, when the representatives of the silver-producing States of the Union combined with the protection people to defeat it. That is when there was a time to pass it.

Mr. STEWART. Let me tell the Senator how it was. The House had twice beaten a free-coinage bill by 30 majority, and everybody knew that the President would veto it. We were situated then just as we are now.

Mr. LINDSAY. Who said the President would have vetoed it? Who had authority to speak for the President?

Mr. STEWART. He said so.

Mr. GRAY. Did the President say so to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LINDSAY. There was at least a time when both Houses of Congress might have passed a bill and put the responsibility upon the Executive.

Mr. STEWART. Let us do so now. There is an opportunity.

Mr. LINDSAY. An opportunity presented itself to sell silver rather than coin it, and the friends of silver embraced the opportunity.

If the friends of free silver are right, that prosperity will come with the adoption of free coinage, then we need no bonds; then we ought to sell no bonds. If we want to build the Nicaragua Canal we shall have to have a special act of authority to sell bonds anyway. Further than that, the time has come when Congress ought to take charge of the credit of this Government, and not to rely upon the President exercising his authority under the act of 1875—the act for redemption. The President has gone as far as he ought to be required to go, and I hope he will not take another step in keeping up the credit of the Government by selling bonds, but that he will put the responsibility where it belongs, upon the Congress of the United States. If a calamity comes, then let the responsibility rest where it belongs.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to ask him a question? My understanding is that Mr. Harrison was President of the United States in 1890. Do I understand the Senator to say that the President at that time declared that he would veto a free-coinage bill?

Mr. STEWART. So we were informed. I was not in communication with him personally. [Laughter.] But several Senators told me that he had so declared.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator indicate who it was who told him or who was in communication with the President on this subject, and what his authority is for saying that President Harrison declared himself against the free coinage of silver?

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Nevada will allow me, I will state that I know of my own personal knowledge that President Harrison declared again and again that he would veto a free-coinage bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is quite sufficient.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to say that I shall vote for the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, though it contains some minor propositions which do not meet my approbation. One of these is found in that part of section 4 which compels the reissue of greenbacks whenever redemption takes place.

For myself, I do not believe we shall ever achieve a restoration of orderly finance until the present system of reissuing the demand notes of the Government is abandoned, and whenever a fair and conciliatory plan looking to that end is presented to the Senate I expect to vote for it.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not want a false impression to go out to the country that there has ever been an opportunity to get free coinage or that there ever will be an opportunity to get free coinage while a gold man is in the White House, and gold men have been there for the last twenty years. It would therefore require a two-thirds vote to get it, and the President, with 300,000 offices, using them to defeat it, makes that an impossibility. We have seen that over and over again. In 1890 there were several test votes in the other House. On what they regarded as a special test vote there was, if I remember correctly, 31 majority against free coinage in that body.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] who is not present has stated that he consented to that bill in order to defeat free coinage. There was no more chance then for free coinage than there is now. That is the way they expect to defeat free coinage forever—if they can get the President. The views of Mr. President Harrison on this subject are no different from those of Mr. President Cleveland.

Mr. LINDSAY. May I ask the Senator why he consented to that bill?

Mr. STEWART. Because I was informed that it would be executed; and no part of it was ever executed fairly and honestly by anybody. It is too long a story to tell. That would have been a good act if the Administration had coined the silver and paid it out on the Government obligations, paid it out in the redemption of those notes. There would have been no raid on the Treasury at all. We would have had plenty of money and prosperity. It was the conduct of both Administrations in refusing to obey the law, although it was mandatory, that caused the trouble.

This distress has been brought upon the country by Administrations in refusing to pay coin and by refusing to exercise the option. There would have been no raids on the Treasury, and we would have a supply of money from this source if it had not been for the surrender of the option of the Government. The act was a good one, and the Senator from Ohio himself, who voted for it and then voted to repeal it, stated here in his place that it had saved the country from a panic in 1890, and had done a great deal of good up to that date. But he was ready then to kill it. Why? Because he was in sympathy with the payment in gold. He was in sympathy with the process by which the Treasury was drained. He was in sympathy with those who gave away for nothing that valuable option which, if it had been exercised by this Government, would have given us prosperity. Doing the same thing we ask to have done did not injure the Governments of France and Germany. We ask for the exercise of the option in favor of the Government, because discrimination against Government money and the refusal to execute that law have brought calamity. If you would execute what is left of the law you would stop the raids on the Treasury.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I was induced to offer this amendment because Senators had declared upon this floor from time to time that they believed the time had come when it was necessary and proper to withdraw from the Secretary of the Treasury any power he might have under the act of 1875 to issue the bonds of this Government. I took occasion in some remarks I made in this Chamber two years ago the present month to show, I think conclusively, that every bond issued by the present Administration was issued in direct violation of law. I have not the slightest doubt but that I could impanel a jury of twelve honest men in this country and prove to them and receive a verdict from them to the effect that the bonds are issued absolutely without any authority of law whatever.

Senators from time to time have been in favor of withdrawing this power, if any power existed. Acting upon the supposition that some power does exist or may exist under the law of 1875, I have offered this amendment for the purpose of testing those who claim they are in favor of monetary reform, and I can not be induced by appeals to withdraw the amendment. If there is any Senator in this Chamber whose loyalty to silver is of such a precarious nature that it is liable to snap upon an amendment of this kind, I want to see him go upon record and let his loyalty be determined.

We have had altogether too much of holding up hands and professing loyalty to silver when there was no opportunity to enact it into a law, and we have had a scuttling to the moss and the deep places in the pool when it came to voting upon measures of this kind. I shall insist upon the amendment being voted upon at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURROWS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY]. I do not know how he would vote upon this proposition, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. CULLOM'S name was called).

The announcement that I made concerning the pairs of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] will stand on this vote as on the preceding vote.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I will announce the pair of the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] for the day. I vote "nay."

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. If the Senator from Georgia were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], but as we are of one mind on this question, I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. Will his colleague inform me how he would vote if present?

Mr. CAMERON. I think my colleague would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I inquire whether the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] has voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. TURPIE. I withhold my vote. If the senior Senator from Minnesota were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GEAR. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] is absent and unpaired. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] to the Senator from New Jersey and vote "nay."

Mr. BLANCHARD. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. CAFFERY] is detained from the Chamber. A pair has been announced between him and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I feel justified in stating that if my colleague were present, he would vote "nay" upon this amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. I withheld my vote, not knowing how the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] would vote, but upon the announcement of his colleague that he would vote "nay" I desire to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO. Has the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON] voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has voted.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 54; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer an amendment to come in as a proviso after the first section of the substitute proposed by the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the first section of the committee amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That the seigniorage upon all coinage of silver under this act shall be retained by the United States equal in amount to the difference between the coining value and the commercial value of silver bullion when presented at the mint.

Mr. MORRILL. That seems to me so fair a proposition that it can hardly be objected to by anybody. Certainly the United States ought not to be compelled to work for nothing and to add about 2 cents to the cost and to the value of the silver dollar. When the French Government had their mints open to free coinage they often asked more than the cost for seigniorage, because there was a little more difference between the coining value and the actual value of silver and gold coin. This ought to be taken for the benefit of the Government. I think those who live in silver States, who are so anxious to bestow the beneficence of free coinage upon the whole country, will be glad to take away the selfish part of the bill, so that it will not be said that the silver mines are to profit by all the difference there is between the coining value and the commercial value of silver bullion.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not know why we should object to having silver certificates out for this silver. What objection is there? They are the best money we have, and about all the money we have. If you go to a bank and get anything besides silver certificates I shall be disappointed. I do not believe that outside of the banks, the hoards, and the Treasury Department, there is $30,000,000 of Treasury notes in circulation. The $330,000,000 of silver certificates, redeemable in silver coin, do three-fourths—I think four-fifths—of all the business that is done in the United States. That is practically all the money we have. If we could have more of that kind of money I think we would be better off.

Mr. PEFFER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont would, I have no doubt, be acceptable to every gold monometallist on this side and on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean. It is an utter giving away, an utter sale, an utter barter by the silver men—the alleged silver men—of all that there is in the silver proposition. If there is anything in the principle involved in the free and unlimited coinage of silver, it is that as among metals gold and silver are exactly alike, one of equal value with the other so far as their money function is concerned.

The Senator from Vermont knows, as we all do, that the law protects the value of gold. The law fixes the value of gold. It has done so for nearly a thousand years, certainly for five hundred years, while we have thrown silver open upon the market to find its price level with corn, and wheat, and cotton, and tobacco, and horses, and cattle, and all other items of property.

Now, if we are to allow the Government to take the difference between the coinage value and the bullion value of silver, we give the entire question away. So far as the Populists are concerned, we shall undoubtedly vote solidly against this amendment. I know that the silver men upon the part of both sides of the Chamber, Democrats and Republicans alike, when we had a vote upon this question in 1893, voted in favor of a substantially similar proposition. It was presented by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. Last year, in January, just a little more than a year from this time, the Senator from Arkansas proposed a bill, and it was advertised to the country as a free-coinage bill. The newspaper people were waiting anxiously day after day until a vote would be taken, in order that the silver strength of the Senate might be exhibited. Instead of being a free-coinage bill, the first seven or eight sections provided for the issuing of $500,000,000 of bonds in order to redeem the greenbacks. It did not reach the silver question until it came to the ninth section, and that embraced a proposition exactly similar to the one embodied in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. I call the attention of the Senate and of the people of the country through the Senate to the vote that is about to be taken upon this amendment.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I feel compelled to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, although I recognize his great experience and general soundness upon these questions. I do not believe it is wise, whatever may be our system of coinage or the attitude of this Government toward the two metals, to attempt what has been so often discussed, to go into a matter of buying either one metal or the other. If we are to have free coinage we will have it; and I do not know that the consequences which I apprehend from such a state of things will be much worse than would result from buying silver or buying gold and paying the seigniorage into the Treasury of the United States.

I can understand the philosophy of bimetallism, but I do not understand the philosophy of the abnormal situation in which the United States has been for so many years since 1878, or that in which it would be put by this amendment, which is not recognized, I believe, by any sound-money men, so called, as consistent with their theories.

But, Mr. President, I was very much struck just now with something that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] said in regard to the curious situation in which we found ourselves on July 10, 1890, when the compromise measure known as the Sherman bill passed this body.

The Senator from Colorado said that he knew—I did not understand him to say that he had been told, but that he knew—that there was no danger of the President of the United States not vetoing a free-silver measure at that time.

Mr. TELLER. I did not understand the Senator's remark.

Mr. GRAY. I say I understood the Senator from Colorado to say that he knew—not that he had been told personally by the President—that the President would veto such a measure.

Mr. TELLER. I did not say how I knew it, but I said I knew it.

Mr. GRAY. That is just what I said, that the Senator said he knew it. To show the condition of apprehension at that time, which brought about the so-called compromise measure of 1890, I want to read from the interesting history recently published by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in which he describes the situation. He says:

> The situation at that time was critical. A large majority of the Senate favored free silver, and it was feared that the small majority against it in the other House might yield and agree to it. The silence of the President on the matter gave rise to an apprehension that if a free-coinage bill should pass both Houses he would not feel at liberty to veto it.

I thought that ought to be read as a contribution to the history of that interesting period.

Mr. VOORHEES. Who is that from?

Mr. GRAY. From the book of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], Forty Years in the House, Senate, and Cabinet. So that it is well for the truth of history that we should remember that the Senator from Kentucky was correct when he said there was a time recently in the history of the Congress of the United States when it was entirely probable that a free-coinage measure might have been passed.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I shall vote for this amendment. I thought I would not vote for any amendment to the bill except the one proposed by the committee; but on seeing it at the desk and on considering it, particularly with reference to the source from which it proceeds, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who is a very conservative member of that committee, and in view of his relations to all those who are considered as exceedingly conservative on that question, I think we may be able to get some legislation if we shall adopt this amendment in good faith, while I do not think we shall be able to get any if we simply adopt the amendment of the committee. That is the reason why I am willing to vote for the amendment. I think a half loaf is better than no bread; and I believe it is better for the people of the United States to have what help they can get in this way than not to get any. The condition we are in at present is that we are getting no coinage of silver whatever.

I believe the expansion to be derived from the adoption of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Vermont would give to the people additional money, and additional silver money. It will simply preserve in the Treasury an amount of silver that shall be equal to the difference between the coin value and the bullion value, while the silver coin representing the entire gold value of the full amount of silver bullion received would be issued as money, thus increasing the primary money of the country. In other words, it would be conforming somewhat to the amendments proposed some years ago by the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and others, increasing the ratio from 16 to 20 or 24, or some other practicable ratio, without changing the size and weight of the coin, as he proposed to do. That is what it would amount to; and I believe we ought, if possible, to get such legislation as will afford some measure of relief to the people of the United States, and I do not think there will be any injustice in it to the mine owners. I think they would get an additional market for their product, and the people of the United States, who create this additional value, under present existing circumstances, would have the benefit of the difference and not the mine owners.

I am not trying to discriminate against the mine owners. I should be willing to have the whole business on the line of the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and that the people of the United States and of the world should enjoy all the benefits of such a law; but inasmuch as we know distinctly that we can not secure such legislation, I say it may be wise for us to listen to the counsel of the honorable Senator from Vermont, and to get this amendment incorporated in the bill. Perhaps, by this means, we may be able to secure the passage of a bill to which the President will affix his signature, and thus get a favorable result. It seems to me, as I said before, that it is better to take this half loaf than not to have any bread at all.

Mr. DUBOIS. Will the Senator from Washington allow me to ask him a question before he sits down?

Mr. SQUIRE. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask if he thinks there would be any difference between the bullion value and the mint value of silver if we had free and unlimited coinage?

Mr. SQUIRE. I will answer the Senator from Idaho. I believe that in time there would not be any difference, but I believe it would require time to adjust the present difference. There has been a disparity as to the value of the money metals when silver has enjoyed high privileges in that respect. I believe time will be required to close up the gap between the two metals.

Mr. DUBOIS. I was going to say, if the Senator would allow me, that the advocates of the free and unlimited coinage of silver believe that immediately on the enactment of such a law the difference between the mint value and the bullion value would disappear.

Mr. SQUIRE. There is a wide difference between the views of extremists on this subject. The only safe thing for us to adopt at present is the middle path. We know that the friends of silver not only in this country, but in Germany, France, and England, believe that it is wise and proper for the money metals of the world to suffer no appreciable diminution; that there should be rather an increase than a decrease in the money of primary payment; and we know that there are men here willing to work in that direction, who have been doing it for years, and there does not appear to be any coming together between the two extremes. On the other hand, the gold men insist upon the gold standard, and apply that touchstone exclusively to the currency of the whole world. The chasm between these extremists is as wide as that between Dives and Lazarus. Thus nothing is done and the debtor class continues to suffer. I would have relief afforded by bringing both extremes together in the middle path, which I consider to be the path of safety. I take my stand with the silver men, but I am willing to accept a part if I can not secure all.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am in favor of this amendment, but I do not rise for the purpose of discussing it at this moment. As all debate is to end at 2 o'clock, I desire to explain at this time an amendment which I propose to offer to this bill when it comes out of Committee of the Whole and into the Senate, an amendment which has already been laid before the Senate, and on which there has been some slight discussion. The bill that came from the House of Representatives, as I said before, it is quite obvious can not pass the Senate. The silver substitute reported by the majority of the Finance Committee, to which I am utterly opposed as a measure utterly disastrous to business and leading directly to silver monometallism, can not pass the House of Representatives. We know that it is merely to go into conference and end there. The amendment I intend to offer does not bear on the question of gold or silver or the redemption of greenbacks; and as this free-silver substitute is an amendment to a bond bill, it is attempted to make provision for a popular loan, to be paid for in lawful money as needed for the purpose of coast defenses.

The Secretary of War has informed the country that it would take twenty years, at the present rate of progress, to supply the guns necessary for coast defenses; that it will take seventy years, at the present rate of progress, to supply the positions to put those guns on. The highest military authorities say that with a lump appropriation for a comprehensive plan we can have our coasts defended adequately and as they ought to be inside of three years; and it should be done in a simple, economical, intelligent method.

The amendment which I propose to offer bears simply on the creation of a popular loan in order to put that money into the Treasury. No one would undertake to raise eighty million or one hundred million dollars, which is needed for coast defenses, from revenue at once. It can not be done. The only way is a loan.

I desire to offer the amendment at this time. If the silver substitute is to perish in conference, as we know, and the bond bill is to perish in conference, there seems to be no good reason why out of the wreck we should not at least save a measure which will provide for coast defenses to be established by law hereafter under such acts as Congress may see fit to pass.

I merely desire to give this explanation of the amendment which I propose to offer, because I can see that the debate will be cut off before the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. SQUIRE. I do not wish to make a speech. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he is well advised when he states that these coast defenses can be provided in the term of three years? As I understand it, after some diligent application on my part to this subject in committee, it will be impossible to provide proper coast defenses, even with unlimited supplies of money, within three years, or anywhere near that. In a few days the statements of the great experts, the Chief of Engineers and the Chief of Ordnance, made before the Committee on Coast Defenses, will be printed, so that the Senator from Massachusetts can read and ascertain that the time required will be much greater.

Mr. LODGE. In making that statement I assume that there will be money in the Treasury to meet it.

Mr. SQUIRE. Even without regard to money.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. Supposing the money to be appropriated, I understand on the highest military authority, the head of the Army, that it can be done in three years.

Mr. SQUIRE. I think that the Senator from Massachusetts is incorrect about the time required.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, Congress has been called upon to give immediate relief to the Treasury. So urgently was that relief needed that we were requested to remain here during the Christmas holidays to see if it were not possible to perfect some measure which would relieve the drain upon the Treasury. In answer to that request from the Executive we have before us the pending bill from the House of Representatives as one of the series of measures proposed—a bill to authorize the issuance of 3 per cent bonds and short-term certificates to meet any deficiency with regard to the current revenues. The Senate Committee on Finance, being hostile politically to the Administration, has responded by proposing the unlimited coinage of silver.

Mr. President, it was as well known on the day the pending substitute was reported as it is now that the present conditions upon the silver question are precisely what they were in 1890. It will be impossible to have this provision become a law at this time, or at any time prior to March, 1897.

Mr. MORGAN. Why?

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Alabama asks me why. The public declarations of the President of the United States must convince every man in the country that a bill containing such a provision can not meet with his approval. I stated a moment ago, if I mistake not, that such a provision could not receive the assent of a coordinate branch of this Government.

Mr. ALLEN. The Democratic platform calls for it.

Mr. GORMAN. Under the conditions which exist in this Chamber the advocates of the free coinage of silver can not themselves agree upon any proposition, as has been evidenced by this debate. Those who desire that silver shall be a metal of final redemption have not, as appears by the votes which have been taken to-day, been able to agree upon any proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to call his attention to the fact, which I know he will admit as fully as anybody on this floor, that it is no part of the duty of the Congress of the United States to legislate under the directions of the President of the United States. Their legislation must be independent.

Mr. GORMAN. I fully agree to that proposition, and only regret that there has not been more independence in the past. The Senator from Alabama will not go further than will I to resent the encroachments of any Executive, and to resent any suggestions or recommendations, except those he is bound to make by the Constitution of the United States, to which due weight should be given, without intimidation or the fear of political power or patronage from the President.

Mr. President, with a view to bring this question to a direct vote, I move that the amendment of the Committee on Finance be laid upon the table.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There is a motion pending.

Mr. GORMAN. The amendment pending goes with it.

Mr. MILLS. Will the motion of the Senator from Maryland carry the bill with it?

Mr. GORMAN. No; the bill itself will stand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to lay the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance on the table.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas and Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think anybody understands what the motion is. I do not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the pending question. The Senator from Maryland moves to lay upon the table the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TELLER. The substitute of the committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute of the committee, which carries with it the pending amendment of the Senator from Vermont. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. CULLOM's name was called). The senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] has a standing pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], and the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has a standing pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN]. A transfer of those pairs has been made, so that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is paired on this vote with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. The other two Senators are released, so that they may vote.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." He is detained, as I before announced, by a death in his family. I should vote "nay," were he present.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] and vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] is unavoidably detained from the Senate, and is paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay." I suppose the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE] would vote "yea."

Mr. GORMAN. The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE] would vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. In connection with the pairs, I will state that if the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask that the pairs be announced.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Reporter will read the pairs.

The Reporter read the pairs as appearing above.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 43; as follows:

So the Senate refused to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of section 1 of the committee's amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That a seigniorage upon all coinage of silver under this act shall be retained by the United States equal in amount to the difference between the coining value and the commercial value of silver bullion when presented at the mint.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 33, nays 44; as follows:

NOT VOTING—12.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Hansbrough,	Sewell,
Blackburn,	Dubois,	Morgan,	Smith,
Brice,	Gordon,	Quay,	Wolcott.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAKER. Are amendments still in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will have read the agreement in regard to a vote. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. HARRIS. * * * I should be glad to have an agreement that after the recess which is to begin at 4 o'clock this afternoon, when we break up to-night, it be to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and after the Senator from Vermont shall have concluded his remarks, that the Senate proceed upon amendments under the five-minute rule until we reach a final vote upon the passage of the bill at the earliest hour to-morrow that the Senate may be ready to come to such vote, not later than 2 o'clock. I ask unanimous consent for that agreement.

The Senator from New York, as does every Senator other than he, understands the main and primary object I have in view. It is to reach a final vote by 2 o'clock to-morrow, in order that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] in charge of the pending bill may be at liberty to leave the city for a short period, as it is important to him to leave at that time. Now, I shall have no objection to the motion suggested by the Senator from New York except the consumption of time. But if I can get the agreement that we shall come to a vote at or before 2 o'clock to-morrow upon the final passage of the bill, I care not how the time may be consumed until we reach that hour.

Mr. HILL. Then, with the understanding that the motion to substitute, if any, shall be made prior to 2 o'clock—is that satisfactory? Without debate?

Mr. HARRIS. If it be without debate, and the yeas and nays upon it, if the yeas and nays be ordered, shall not go beyond 2 o'clock, I am quite content to accept the suggestion.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am quite content, too.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I certainly understood that, while debate was to cease at 2 o'clock, amendments were not to be cut off at that hour, but that we were to proceed to vote upon amendments and the bill without debate and finish the bill. I did not suppose any Senator understood it differently. I do not know now that any Senator understood it differently.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has had read the agreement as the Chair understood it to be made by the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. My object was distinctly, or, at least, as distinctly as I was able to explain myself, that the Senate should come to a vote upon the final passage of the bill at 2 o'clock to-day. That was agreed to by the unanimous consent of the Senate. I submit that any amendment offered now or asked to be voted upon now is in violation of the agreement that we reached yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. On the point of order that has been made, I will state that day before yesterday when there was a discussion in the Senate as to coming to an agreement, I then asked if amendments were to be cut off. I was told that of course they were not to be cut off. I for one never should have agreed to any such proposition. I have an amendment which I desire to offer when the bill has reached another stage, and it is certainly something entirely new to attempt to cut off votes on amendments. I do not think any such understanding was had with the Senate, certainly not when I was present.

Mr. HOAR. If my colleague will allow me, I will suggest that when the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] offered his amendment he was earnestly appealed to by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to delay offering it until the bill came into the Senate and not to press it at that time. And although the Senator did not withdraw his amendment, that argument passed unchallenged by the whole Senate that he would be at liberty to offer it at a later stage.

Mr. PALMER. I desire merely to make an inquiry for information with reference to a single amendment. Yesterday I gave notice that at some time I would offer an amendment, which is printed on page 1148. I desire to ask whether, in the opinion of the Chair, I may still offer the amendment and ask for a vote on it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will answer the Senator from Illinois when——

Mr. HARRIS. The Chair has never held, so far as my observation has gone, that as a question of order the Chair could enforce a unanimous-consent agreement. It rests upon the observance of the body to the agreement it has made. I have raised no question of order; I shall raise no question of order; but I repeat that any amendment offered now at this hour is in violation of the express agreement of yesterday.

Mr. FAULKNER. If Senators will recur to the RECORD where it shows the proceeding at the time the agreement was made, they will clearly see that the question of amendment and the question of consent as to time of debate on amendments embraced one proposition, and that if amendments are now permitted, necessarily the other rule will have to follow, which would be the agreement as to five minutes' discussion. I do not think I exaggerate when I say I have seen a dozen agreements of this character, and no amendments were ever offered after the time was reached when it was agreed to vote upon the final passage of the bill, except such amendments as were pending at the time when the hour arrived. Therefore I feel compelled under the unanimous-consent agreement to refrain from offering any amendment after 2 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires at this stage to answer the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER]. The agreement entered into, as appears from the RECORD, which has been read, is not a rule of the Senate and can not be enforced by the Chair. The observance of an agreement is in the hands of the Senate. The Chair will recognize amendments that are offered under the rules of the Senate. The Senator from Kansas first addressed the Chair.

Mr. BAKER. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to make a statement? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] refers to a statement I made. I was not present when the agreement was made and I did not myself know that we had either the five-minutes rule or the 2-o'clock rule.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me; it was not simply the view he took, but it was made in full Senate, so that the whole Senate understood it.

Mr. TELLER. That might have been upon the theory that we would get the bill into the Senate before 2 o'clock. I should feel very much embarrassed if I had misled the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], but as he did not accept my proposition, of course I have nothing to say.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg Senators to observe in regard to this unanimous-consent agreement that it will be a dangerous precedent in the Senate for the remainder of this session.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Such an agreement has never been violated before.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not recall that such an agreement has ever been violated in the whole history of the Senate. This will be the first time that it has been violated, and its consequences may not be pleasant in the future.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the Senator from Kansas offers his amendment, I should like to have the question settled whether there is a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me?

Mr. BAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. We are threatened by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Missouri with woeful things if we violate a consent agreement, as they understand it. I do not think that Senators upon this side of the Chamber who wish to offer amendments are going to offer them under the implied presumption that they are offering them in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement. I will read——

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will state any language of mine that amounts to a threat. I should be glad if he would state it, if he finds a threat in anything I have said.

Mr. CHANDLER. I except the Senator, then. His manner was somewhat threatening.

Mr. HARRIS. It is, perhaps, always so.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Missouri certainly warned us that woeful consequences would follow if further amendments were offered to this bill. Mr. President, the facts are very simple. When the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into I understood, and every Senator upon this side of the Chamber understood, that, although debate was to cease at 2 o'clock, there was to be no limitation upon the offering of amendments, or the voting upon amendments, either those of which notice had been given or those which might be offered.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me just there?

Mr. CHANDLER. I want first to answer what the Senator from West Virginia has already stated.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to correct the Senator from New Hampshire just at this point. The RECORD shows that in reply to the question of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] stated that the motion the Senator from New York proposed to make would be before 2 o'clock, and if the yeas and nays would not be taken by 2 o'clock the motion would have to fall under the consent agreement.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not so remember.

Mr. FAULKNER. The RECORD shows it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The RECORD does not show it. The Senator from New York and the Senator from Tennessee had a discussion as to whether a motion to proceed after 2 o'clock to take up for consideration some other bill would be in order, and the Senator from Tennessee insisted that it would not be in order. The Senator from New York, I think—he can speak for himself—conceded that that might not be in order, but it was conceded with equal distinctness that any motion whatever applicable to the pending bill would be in order after 2 o'clock. Now, I will read——

Mr. FAULKNER. I wish the Senator from New Hampshire, as he questions the correctness of my statement, would permit me to read from the RECORD. Will the Senator permit me to read what I rely upon?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will in a moment, if the Senator will wait. I read from the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee. In the course of his discussion with the Senator from New York, he said:

Mr. HARRIS. A motion in the shape of an amendment in the nature of a substitute would certainly fall within the unanimous-consent agreement that I have asked for.

That is to say, it would be admissible.

A motion to lay upon the table would be perfectly legitimate in my opinion under such a unanimous-consent rule. But a motion, if such rule shall be carried, to take up for consideration some other bill would be wholly inconsistent with the very object and purpose that I have in view, and I hope the Senator from New York will exclude that proposition from his suggestion. Each of his other suggestions I concede as being perfectly consistent with the unanimous-consent agreement I ask for.

A little later the following colloquy took place:

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand the Senator from Tennessee does not preclude any motion whatever applicable to the pending bill?
Mr. PLATT. Not to preclude any parliamentary motion.
Mr. HARRIS. Any motion that can legitimately be made under the rules of the Senate I would hold to be in order under the unanimous-consent rule——
Mr. CHANDLER. As to the pending bill.
Mr. HARRIS. With the single exception that debate is to be limited to five minutes.
Mr. CHANDLER. Upon amendments?
Mr. HARRIS. Upon amendments.
Mr. CHANDLER. That is the way I understand the request.

And I say to the Senator from Missouri, who I do not think was here at the time the unanimous consent was agreed upon, and who had better ascertain what a unanimous agreement is before he threatens Senators upon this side of the Chamber with any great extremity in the near future, that he should find out what the unanimous agreement was before he threatens us; because——

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. CHANDLER. Because, in my judgment, although debate was to cease at 2 o'clock and we were to proceed to the final passage of the bill, it was distinctly understood that all amendments were to be in order.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to have the Senator from New Hampshire read what was said just before the unanimous consent of the Senate was given. That is the true criterion.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from West Virginia can read it.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me, I desire to bring it down to the exact proposition that I stated when I rose to address the Senate and was interrupted, and to read the conclusion of the discussion in regard to the unanimous-consent agreement. The matters to which the Senator was referring were in reference to a motion to lay on the table or a motion to indefinitely postpone, which motions of course would be in order at any time. But in the latter part of the colloquy which resulted in the consent agreement the following appears:

Mr. HILL. Then, with the understanding that the motion to substitute, if any, shall be made prior to 2 o'clock—is that satisfactory? Without debate?
Mr. HARRIS. If it be without debate, and the yeas and nays upon it, if the yeas and nays be ordered, shall not go beyond 2 o'clock. I am quite content to accept the suggestion.

Now, that excludes everything but a motion to indefinitely postpone or a motion to lay on the table upon proceeding to the third reading of the bill.

Mr. GRAY. Thereupon the consent of the Senate was given.

Mr. FAULKNER. Thereupon, immediately after that colloquy, the consent of the Senate was given.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question. Is not the reservation distinctly made of any motion whatever applicable to the pending bill?

Mr. GRAY. Provided it was before 2 o'clock.

Mr. CHANDLER. When the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] stated, "Not to preclude any parliamentary motion," I ask whether a motion to amend is not a motion applicable to the pending bill?

Mr. FAULKNER. Any motion applicable to the pending bill not involving amendments, the motions involving amendments being accompanied with the five-minute rule.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of what use would it be for us to discuss amendments here under the five-minute rule until 2 o'clock and then not be able to have them voted on?

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me one word?

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. GORMAN. There has never been, I think, in the history of the Senate, any violation of an understanding of this sort. There have been sometimes, however, as there appears to be in this case, a disagreement as to the precise terms of an agreement, and whenever that occurs a liberal interpretation has always been given. Now, I trust we will proceed with the consideration of this measure, and, in view of the misunderstanding, permit amendments to be offered and to be voted upon without debate. The main idea suggested by the Senator from Tennessee yesterday, as we all understand, was that we should not only in the interests of the country dispose of this matter promptly, but it was a personal matter with the Senator in charge of the bill, as he must leave the city before 4 o'clock to-day. I ask that we may now go on, permitting any Senator to offer an amendment and vote upon it without debate, so that we may terminate the matter before half past 3 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland ask for unanimous consent?

Mr. GORMAN. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HARRIS. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER] is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. On the 20th day of January, 1896, an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the pending bill was offered and printed. I desire now to have a vote upon that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas will be stated from the desk.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 1 of the amendment reported by the committee add the following proviso:

Provided, however, That this section shall apply to the coinage of the silver mined in the United States of America only.

Mr. BAKER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I hope that I may have the unanimous consent of the Senate to speak for a minute or two. An agreement made in the Senate for the disposition of a bill has never, in my experience, been violated, and I trust it will not be done in this case. Although I was not present during any part of the debate, having been detained at home, I must say that I can not read the statements of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]—the last one made—without feeling myself bound, as a member of the Senate, to proceed to take a vote upon the passage of the bill as it now stands. It seems to me that we ought to be very careful to avoid even the appearance of a violation of an understanding of this kind, notwithstanding that I hope my honorable friend from Tennessee will allow (as there has been a misunderstanding here among Senators) half an hour, by unanimous consent, so that the vote can be taken upon amendments. I wish to be guided entirely by the agreement made in my absence. I feel bound by it, and would not offer an amendment under the circumstances.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I simply——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. PALMER. I desire to say that, after a review of this whole matter, I concluded that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] was the best interpreter of his own purposes. On page 1140 of the RECORD it will be seen that the Senator from Tennessee said:

The Senator from New York, as does every Senator other than he, understands the main and primary object I have in view. It is to reach a final vote by 2 o'clock to-morrow, in order that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] in charge of the pending bill may be at liberty to leave the city for a short period, as it is important to him to leave at that time. Now, I shall have no objection to the motion suggested by the Senator from New York except the consumption of time.

That, in my judgment, is conclusive as showing that the real purpose was that there should be a final vote at 2 o'clock; and I withhold the amendment I suggested.

Mr. GRAY. That is right.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let us have a vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BAKER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senate will agree to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio. I have been here a long time. I see no reason why we should violate the consent rule; and it can easily be avoided by agreeing by unanimous consent to an extension of the time. I hope that the proposition of the Senator from Ohio will be accepted by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. I had but one object in asking for a consent agreement. If anybody was deceived as to what it meant it was his own fault, or the fault of my inability to state exactly what I meant; but I think the RECORD shows exactly what I meant. If this unanimous-consent agreement is to be disregarded—the Senator from New Hampshire charged me with uttering a threat a while ago; I will not utter a threat now, but no more consent agreements will ever be made while I hold a seat on this floor.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas will suspend a moment. The Chair desires the attention of the Senator from Ohio. Will the Senator from Ohio state his request in the form he desires to have it submitted to the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that half an hour, say, will be given for the consideration, without debate, of such amendments as may be offered. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that that may be agreed upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits the request of the Senator from Ohio. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. I object.

Mr. BAKER. I think I can solve this question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection. The Senator from Kansas is recognized. The amendment has been stated and the yeas and nays demanded.

Mr. BAKER. There seems to be some misunderstanding with reference to the agreement. I supposed when the agreement was made that all amendments which had been noted before, and were of record for two or three days, and some of them longer, would be disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. If before 2 o'clock.

Mr. BAKER. But it seems we are now practicing in a justice's court and relying upon technicalities. In order to avoid any question, I will forego my amendment at this time, and therefore restore the dignity of the Senate. I withdraw the proposed amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas is withdrawn.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg leave to give notice that, if there be time after action upon the pending bill shall have been concluded, I shall move for an executive session. The business is in arrears.

Mr. LODGE. I desire, on the point which has been made by the Senator from Kansas, to say one word. I gave notice of an amendment before any agreement was reached. I gave notice of it because I desired to have a vote upon it. I consider that it is a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement to cut off those amendments which were proposed and printed and had been discussed. I never should have assented to a unanimous agreement which, at a given hour, was going to cut off amendments. I understood that the amendments of which notice had been given were to have a vote without debate, and everyone else who had offered an amendment understood it that way. I consider it a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement to try and cut off debate at 2 o'clock. By the consent rule, as I understand it, I shall offer my amendment at the proper time.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I was present in the Senate yesterday when this unanimous consent was given, and therefore I feel bound by it. On the 20th of December I offered an amendment to this bill, as section 5, which provides that—

> It shall be the duty of the Secretary to coin all of the silver bullion now in the Treasury at the rate of not less than $3,000,000 per month: and such coin shall constitute a reserve fund for the redemption of the notes herein provided for.

And it then provides for the issuance of notes. It was my sincere desire to offer this amendment; but in the light of the unanimous-consent agreement yesterday I do not feel as though I should be warranted in violating it by offering the amendment at this or at any other time without unanimous consent. Therefore, I am constrained to withhold it in observation of that agreement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLS and Mr. GORMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. CULLOM'S name was called). The announcement I made on the motion to lay the bill on the table relative to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] being paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] I desire to stand on this vote as before announced.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I announce that I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin (when his name was called). I am generally paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], but I have transferred that pair to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON], and I vote "nay." The Senator from New Jersey, if present, would also vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER (when Mr. WOLCOTT'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] is unavoidably detained from the Senate and is paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MORGAN. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask that the pairs be read by the Reporter as they were stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Reporter will read as requested.

The Reporter read the statement of pairs appearing above.

Mr. GALLINGER. I announce the pair of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. I will also state concerning the pair of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] that if he were present, he would vote "nay" upon the pending question.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 34; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer an amendment of four lines, which I shall read, with the permission of the Senate. I propose to add, as section 5, the following:

> From and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall not issue any bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of the Government unless Congress shall hereafter first authorize the same, any act of Congress now in force to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HILL. If we are going to maintain the unanimous-consent agreement, let us maintain it. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Do I understand that I may offer my amendment now? ["No!" "No!"]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair heretofore recognized the Senator to offer his amendment, and it was withdrawn. If the Senator desires to offer the amendment now, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. BAKER. If it is in order so to do, I desire to have it voted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has stated his position in regard to it. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. FRYE. It is as much against the unanimous-consent agreement as it was before.

Mr. HARRIS. If the rule is to be observed, it is not consistent with the consent agreement. If it is to be violated, the Chair has no power over it, I grant, and I raise no question of order; but it is in violation of the consent agreement of yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I simply desire to again state that I conceive the violation of the unanimous-consent agreement came with the attempt to cut off amendments of which notice had been given, which everyone who had them, including the Senator from Kansas and myself, understood were not to be cut off, and that a vote was to be had on the bill and amendments. I regard the violation of the agreement as coming from those who attempted to cut off the vote on such amendments and have kept us here an hour talking about it.

Mr. HALE. I only wish to contribute to the discussion the understanding that I had of the agreement. I heard the appeal of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] with reference to the desire of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] to leave town and to have a time fixed for the vote; but I supposed that with that agreement, as customarily made in such cases, when the hour was fixed, whatever it was, that the Senate would proceed to vote upon the bill and amendments then pending, and that no other amendments could afterwards be offered. That was my understanding.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the offering of my amendment is to bring up at this time the same old question again, over which there seems to be so much feeling, of course, I again withdraw it, but I supposed the unanimous-consent agreement was off.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognized the Senator for the purpose of offering his amendment. It is for the Senator to decide whether or not he will again offer it.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to make an appeal to my honorable friend from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], of whose desire to be perfectly fair and just nobody who has ever served with him in the Senate or anywhere else will express a doubt. This is not a question of violating a unanimous-consent agreement, and the Senator certainly would not want to fasten upon any one of his colleagues the charge of a willingness to violate such an agreement. It is a question of a misunderstanding whether the Senator be right or somebody else.

There are some Senators here who had given notice long ago of a purpose to offer certain amendments. They have had them printed, and have declared they should move them when the bill came up. They did not understand that they were cut off by the agreement yesterday. They say so on their honor as gentlemen. I think they were cut off. I think the Senator from Tennessee is right. I think the last sentence he uttered, which was: "With the understanding that the substitute is to be offered before 2 o'clock, I consent." A substitute is only an amendment, and the Senator implied when he uttered that, that he supposed the substitute had to be offered before 2 o'clock; it was an amendment to be offered. So I concede he is right.

But I appeal to the Senator from Tennessee now to consent that those Senators who had given notice of amendments, who had them printed, and who say that they understood when the consent was reached that they were to be at liberty to offer them, be permitted to offer them now. It does not make much difference to-day; but it is a very serious thing indeed to have the Senate adjourn with any Senator thinking that any other has violated a consent, or with any Senator thinking that he has been compelled by an inadvertence to forego what he deemed his duty to the country or his constituents in offering amendments. I propose that the agreement be so construed that Senators who had given notice of amendments which they expected to offer, and say that they did not understand they were to be cut off when they consented to this agreement, may be permitted to move those amendments now, and have them voted on without debate. I think that will settle the whole matter satisfactorily to everybody.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, neither the Senator from Massachusetts nor any other Senator would go further to oblige his associates here than I. I had an object in asking for the consent rule yesterday. That object will be fatally defeated if we do not come to a vote on this bill in the next ten minutes.

Mr. HOAR. It can be done in the next ten minutes by adopting my suggestion.

Mr. HARRIS. There are numerous amendments of which notice has been given. I started out with an object; I adhere to it. With the most ardent desire to oblige everybody, the agreement I asked was put in language as plain as it was possible for me to put it. It can have but one meaning. I adhere to it, and if Senators choose to violate it they have a right to do so. That is all there is of it. ["Regular order!" "Regular order!"]

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue bonds to a total amount of $100,000,000 at such times and in such amounts as may be required to carry out the purposes of this section, as hereinafter described. Said bonds shall be payable in coin twenty years from the date of their issue. They shall be offered at par to the people of the United States in denominations ranging from fifty to one thousand dollars, and shall bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum. The subscriptions to the loan, or to such portion of it as may then be required, shall be opened on July 1, 1896, and at such subsequent dates as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine, at all subtreasuries of the United States and at all national banks, and the subscribers shall have the right to pay for the bonds in lawful money of the United States.

The sum of $3,000,000 shall be annually set aside from the revenue of the Government for a sinking fund to pay the bonds issued under this act at maturity, and the $3,000,000 thus annually appropriated shall take precedence of all other appropriations, except those for the sinking fund, now established by law, and for the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt.

The bonds authorized by this act shall constitute a loan, to be known as the "coast-defense loan," and the proceeds of said bonds shall be kept in the Treasury as a fund apart and shall be used only for providing for the defense of the seacoasts and lakes of the United States and for the manufacture of guns, the purchase of sites, and the erection of forts and batteries for that purpose, in accordance with plans prepared by the War Department, as authorized by existing law or by laws hereafter passed by Congress to provide for coast defenses.

Mr. TELLER. I move to lay on the table the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado to lay on the table the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. LINDSAY and Mr. MILLS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when Mr. CULLOM'S name was called). I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is paired on this vote with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If present, the senior Senator from Illinois would vote "nay" and the senior Senator from Kentucky would vote "yea."

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). In again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], I wish to state that I have been advised that he would vote "nay" on this question were he present. I should vote "yea" if I were not paired.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] is paired on this vote with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea." He is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. If the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] were present, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 35; as follows:

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The bill can not be brought before the House except by the express consent of every member of the House. The gentleman desires to make a brief explanation, which can be done without objection.

Mr. POWERS. I will say that the widow of the late Justice Miller is the owner of a small house on Massachusetts avenue in this city, on which is resting a mortgage of $10,000, and the taxes upon which amount to $300 per annum. It is the only property the late Justice Miller left to his widow.

It seems to me, sir, that in view of the long and distinguished services of this justice and the precedents made in similar cases there is eminent propriety in Congress passing this bill appropriating the balance of the salary for the year in which he died, to be applied to the estate left to his widow. It has been done heretofore in other cases, and it seems to me to be a very worthy and deserving object. It passed the Senate unanimously, and was sent here on yesterday. For that reason I ask its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether the bill has been considered by a committee of the House?

Mr. POWERS. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that it has not been, and the only facts that could be made to appear before a committee are already in possession of the House; those I have stated. This woman is in poor circumstances. She has a home, but there is a large mortgage upon it and no means to pay it off. No committee could report any additional facts.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question: Does he claim that there is only a precedent as the basis of the action sought here, or is there any law to justify it?

Mr. POWERS. There is no law except what we may make for ourselves in this case. But I will state to the gentleman that it has been made in other like cases, and I am sure the gentleman from South Carolina must see the propriety of the action proposed.

Mr. TALBERT. I will ask if Judge Miller's successor has not also drawn the salary proposed to be paid here?

Mr. POWERS. I presume so.

Mr. TALBERT. And will it not amount to paying the same salary to two persons?

Mr. POWERS. I was going on to say that I was unable to state certainly whether the successor of Judge Miller received the salary or not, although I presume of course that he did.

Mr. TALBERT. I think it a matter of very great importance. We are spending the people's money right along, and we ought to be well aware of what we are doing. It seems to me that it would be better to let the matter go to a committee, although I only make the suggestion.

Mr. POWERS. I will repeat that no committee could report any additional facts or give further information respecting it than has been already given.

Mr. TALBERT. Possibly that may be so; and while I do not insist upon the objection myself, I merely make the suggestion that it should go to a committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be the establishment of a bad precedent, and that it had better go to a committee.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill will be appropriately referred.

INDEPENDENCE NATIONAL BANK OF PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 285) for the relief of the Independence National Bank of Philadelphia, Pa.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears that V. McNally, captain and ordnance storekeeper, Ordnance Department, United States Army, did, on the 17th day of May, 1895, issue a check, No. 124138, upon the Treasurer of the United States at Washington, D. C., in favor of the Midvale Steel Company, Philadelphia, Pa., for the sum of $36,195.23, being in part payment for material furnished the Ordnance Department, United States Army, and said check was by the said Midvale Steel Company indorsed for deposit in the Independence National Bank of Philadelphia, Pa., and so deposited and drawn against; which check was subsequently mailed by the Independence National Bank to the Treasurer of the United States to be exchanged for notes and was lost in transmission through the United States mails; and

Whereas the provisions of the act of February 16, 1885, amending section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing United States disbursing officers and agents to issue duplicates of lost checks, apply only to checks drawn for $2,500 or less: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That said V. McNally, ordnance officer, United States Army, be, and is hereby, instructed to issue a duplicate of said original check to the Independence National Bank of Philadelphia, Pa., under such regulations in regard to its issue and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of duplicate checks under the provisions of section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. If desired, I will ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report may be read.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, this simply authorizes the issue of a duplicate check?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is all.

Mr. DOCKERY. The general law limiting the issuance of duplicate checks to amounts of less than $2,500?

Mr. BINGHAM. It can not be done under the general statute, because of the limitation of $2,500.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BINGHAM, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AMERICAN REGISTRY FOR BARKS MINDE AND JOHAN LUDWIG.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 173) to provide registers for the barks Minde and Johan Ludwig.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built barks Minde and Johan Ludwig, of the State of Florida, to be registered as vessels of the United States, the Minde to be registered under the name of "Three Brothers," the vessels being owned, respectively, by Albert F. Dewey, of Punta Gorda, Fla., a citizen of the United States, and the Gulf Transit Company, of Florida, incorporated under the laws of that State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SPARKMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ST. LOUIS AND OKLAHOMA CITY RAILROAD COMPANY, INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1691) to authorize the St. Louis and Oklahoma City Railroad Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian and Oklahoma Territories, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the St. Louis and Oklahoma City Railroad Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of Oklahoma Territory, be, and the same is hereby, invested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, owning, equipping, operating, using, and maintaining a railway and telegraph and telephone line through the Indian Territory, beginning at a point to be selected by said railway company at or near Sapulpa, in the Indian Territory, and running through the said Territory and the Territory of Oklahoma by way of Chandler and Oklahoma City to a point on Red River at or near the west line of the Kiowa and Comanche Reservation, with the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turn-outs, and sidings as said company may deem it to their interest to construct.

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a railway, and for no other purpose, a right of way 100 feet in width through said Indian Territory and Territory of Oklahoma, and to take and use a strip of land 200 feet in width, with a length of 3,000 feet in addition, to right of way, for stations, for every 10 miles of road, with the right to use such additional ground where there are heavy cuts or fills as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed, not exceeding 100 feet in width on each side of said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided. That no more than said addition of land shall be taken for any one station: Provided further, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be sold by the company, and they shall not be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railway, telegraph, and telephone lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be used, such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall have been ta[illegible]n.

SEC. 3. That before said railway shall be constructed through any lands held by individual occupants according to the laws, customs, and usages of any of the Indian nations or tribes through which it may be constructed, or by allotments under any law of the United States or agreement with the Indians, full compensation shall be made to such occupants for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of such railway. In case of failure to make amicable settlement with any occupant, such compensation shall be determined by the appraisement of three disinterested referees, to be appointed, one (who shall act as chairman) by the President, one by the chief of the nation to which said occupant belongs, or, in case of an allottee, by said allottee or by his duly authorized guardian or representative, and one by said railway company, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe, before a district judge, clerk of a district court, or United States commissioner, an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their award to and filed with the Secretary of the Interior within sixty days from the completion thereof; and a majority of said referees shall be competent to act in case of the absence of a member, after due notice. And upon the failure of either party to make such appointment within thirty days after the appointment made by the President, the vacancy shall be filled by the district judge of any United States court in the Indian Territory, or the Territory of Oklahoma, upon the application of the other party. The chairman of said board shall appoint the time and place for all hearings within the nation to which such occupant belongs. Each of said referees shall receive for his services the sum of $4 per day for each day they are engaged in the trial of any case submitted to them under this act, with mileage at 5 cents per mile. Witnesses shall receive the usual fees allowed by the courts of said nations and the courts of Oklahoma Territory. Costs, including compensation of the referees, shall be made a part of the award, and be paid by such railway company. In case the referees can not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award. Either party being dissatisfied with the finding of the referees shall have the right, within ninety days after making the award and notice of the same, to appeal by original petition to any district court in the Indian Territory, or Oklahoma Territory, which court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the subject-matter of said petition. If, upon the hearing of said appeal, the judgment of the court shall be for a larger sum than the award of the referees, the cost of said appeal shall be adjudged against the railway company. If the judgment of the court shall be for the same sum as the award of the referees, then the cost shall be adjudged against the appellant. If the judgment of the court shall be for a smaller sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages. When proceedings have been commenced in court, the railway company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of the railway.

SEC. 4. That said railway company shall not charge the inhabitants of said Territories a greater rate of freight than the rate authorized by the laws of the State of Kansas for services or transportation of the same kind: Provided, That passenger rates on said railway shall not exceed 3 cents per mile. Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the charges for freight and passengers on said railway and messages on said telegraph and telephone lines, until a State government or governments shall exist in said Territories within the limits of which said railway, or a part thereof, shall be located; and then such State government or governments shall be authorized to fix and regulate the cost of transportation of persons and freights within their respective limits by said railway; but Congress expressly reserves the right to fix and regulate, at all times, the cost of such transportation by said railway or said company whenever such transportation shall extend from one State into another, or shall extend into more than one State: Provided, however, That the rate of such transportation of passengers, local or interstate, shall not exceed the rate above expressed: And provided further, That said railway company shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and until such rate is fixed by law the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation.

SEC. 5. That said railway company shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the particular nations or tribes or individuals through whose lands said line may be located, the sum of $50, in addition to compensation provided for in this act, for property taken and damages done to individual occupants by the construction of the railway for each mile of railway that it may construct in said Territories, said payments to be made in installments of $500 as each 10 miles of road is graded: Provided, That if the general council of either of the nations or tribes through whose land said railway may be located shall, within four months after the filing of maps of definite location as set forth in section 6 of this act, dissent from the allowance provided for in this section, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Interior, then all compensation to be paid to such dissenting nation or tribe under the provisions of this act shall be determined as provided in section 3 for the determination of the compensation to be paid to the individual occupant of lands, with the right of appeal to the courts upon the same terms, conditions, and requirements as therein provided: Provided further, That the amount awarded or adjudged to be paid by the said railway company for dissenting nation or tribe shall be in lieu of the compensation that said nation or tribe would be entitled to receive under the foregoing provision. Said company shall also pay, so long as said Territories are owned and occupied by the Indians, to the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $15 per annum for each mile of railway it shall construct in the said Territories. The money paid to the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act shall be apportioned by him in accordance with the laws and treaties now in force among the different nations and tribes according to the number of miles of railway that may be constructed by said railway company through their lands: Provided, That Congress shall have the right, so long as said lands are occupied and possessed by said nations and tribes, to impose such additional taxes upon said railway as it may deem just and proper for their benefit; and any Territory or State hereafter formed through which said railway shall have been established may exercise the like power as to such part of said railway as may lie within its limits. Said railway company shall have the right to survey and locate its railway immediately after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located lines through said Territories to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and also to be filed in the office of the principal chiefs of each of the nations or tribes through whose lands said railway may be located; and after the filing of said maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company: Provided. That when a map showing any portion of said railway company's located line is filed as herein provided for, said company shall commence grading said located line within six months thereafter, or such location shall be void; and said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior in sections of 25 miles before construction of any such section shall be begun.

SEC. 7. That the officers, servants, and employees of said company necessary to the construction and management of said railway shall be allowed to reside, while so engaged, upon such right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws, and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with said intercourse laws.

SEC. 8. That said railway company shall build at least 50 miles of its railway in said Territory within three years after the passage of this act, and complete the remainder thereof within three years thereafter, or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built; that said railway construct and maintain continually all fences, road and highway crossings, and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way, or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

SEC. 9. That the said Oklahoma Central Railroad shall accept this right of way upon the express condition, binding upon itself, its successors and assigns, that they will neither aid, advise, nor assist in any effort looking toward the changing or extinguishing the present tenure of the Indians in their lands, and will not attempt to secure from the Indian nation any further grant of land, or its occupancy, than is hereinbefore provided: Provided, That any violation of the condition mentioned in this section shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights and privileges of said railway company under this act.

SEC. 10. That all mortgages executed by said railway company, conveying any portion of its railway, with its franchises, that may be constructed in said Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, shall be recorded in the Department of the Interior, and the record thereof shall be evidence and notice of their execution and shall convey all rights and property of said company as therein expressed.

SEC. 11. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, or alter this act; and the right of way herein and hereby granted shall not be assigned or transferred in any form whatever prior to the construction and completion of the railway, except as to mortgages or other liens that may be given or secured thereon to aid in the construction thereof.

The Committee on Indian Affairs recommended the adoption of the following amendments:

On page 2, line 5, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one"; on the same page, in line 6, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "two"; on same page, in line 10, strike out the words "one hundred" and insert the word "fifty."

On page 4, line 34, after the word "mile," add the words "actually traveled."

In section 6, page 8, line 8, strike out all after the word "provided" and add the following: "That a map showing the entire line of the road in the Indian Territory shall be filed and approved before the work of construction shall commence."

On page 9, section 9, strike out all of line 1 after the word "said" and insert "Saint Louis and Oklahoma City Railroad Company."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I could not hear the reading of the bill. Is it a Senate bill or a House bill?

The SPEAKER. A House bill.

Mr. TALBERT. Has it been before the committee?

Mr. FLYNN. Yes, and it has been favorably reported. It passed both Houses in the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read to the House?

There was no objection.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the reading of the bill, and I should be glad to have some explanation of it.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, this bill, for a right of way through the Indian Territory and part of the Oklahoma Territory, passed both the House and the Senate in the Fifty-third Congress. Gentlemen who were members of that House will doubtless remember that on the Sunday before our adjournment we undertook to pass the bill over the President's veto. Although the House was largely in sympathy with the Executive, the two-thirds necessary to pass the bill over the veto lacked but very few votes. The Committee on Indian Affairs at this session have recommended that the bill be so amended as to meet the objections urged by the President in his veto, with one exception. That was that the promoters of the enterprise should first secure the approval of the Indians. The Committee on Indian Affairs, in reporting on that proposition, say in their report:

A bill similar to this was passed by the Fifty-third Congress, but was vetoed by the President. The grounds for his refusal to approve the bill were: "(1) The bill did not provide for the procurement of the consent of the Indians; (2) the grant was too liberal as to side tracks, turn-outs, and branches, sidings, and extensions, and as to station privileges in general; and (3) the bill should have provided for the filing and approval of a map of definite location of the entire line of the road before any part thereof was constructed."

Your committee is of the opinion that the second and third reasons given by the President in his veto were sound, but do not agree with the first one.

Your committee is satisfied that the exercise of eminent domain over the country occupied by the five tribes of Indians does not violate the legal rights of the Indians, provided they are given a reasonable price for the land taken, and no more land than is actually necessary is taken.

In this view your committee is but following the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Cherokee Nation vs. The Southern Kansas (135 U. S.).

We ask the passage of the bill for the reasons stated.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PICKLER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

KANSAS CITY, PITTSBURG AND GULF RAILROAD.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 1046.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1046) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Kansas City, Pittsburg, and Gulf Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved February 27, 1893.

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved February 27, 1893, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting immediately after the word "Texas," in said section, the following words, to wit: "With the right to locate, construct, operate, and maintain a branch railroad, telegraph, and telephone line from some point on the main line of said railroad in the Indian Territory, south of the Arkansas River and north of the town of Poteau, by the most feasible and practicable route, to the city of Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas, and with the right to build in the line of said branch railroad a bridge across the Poteau River, whose plan of construction shall be first approved by the Secretary of War," and with the right to locate, construct, maintain, and operate a spur of its railroad from a point on said branch about 4 miles northeast of Scullyville, by the most practicable route to a point on the western line of the State of Arkansas, about 10 miles south of Fort Smith; and with the right to build in the line of said spur a bridge over the Poteau River, whose plan of construction shall first be approved by the Secretary of War, so that the said first section when so amended shall read as follows:

"That the Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf Railroad Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Missouri, be, and the same is hereby, invested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, operating, using, and maintaining a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, beginning at a point on the south line of Cherokee County near the town of Galena, in the State of Kansas, and running thence in a southerly direction through the Indian Territory, or through the State of Arkansas and the Indian Territory, by the most feasible and practicable route, to a point on the Red River near the town of Clarksville, in the State of Texas, with the right to locate, construct, operate, and maintain a branch railroad, telegraph, and telephone line from some point on the main line of said railroad in the Indian Territory, south of the Arkansas River and north of the town of Poteau, by the most feasible and practicable route, to the city of Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas, and with the right to build in the line of said branch railroad a bridge across the Poteau River, whose plan of construction shall be first approved by the Secretary of War, and with the right to locate, construct, maintain, and operate a spur of its railroad from a point on said branch about 4 miles northeast of Scullyville, by the most practicable route to a point on the western line of the State of Arkansas about 10 miles south of Fort Smith; and with the right to build in the line of said spur a bridge over the Poteau River, whose plan of construction shall first be approved by the Secretary of War, and with the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turn-outs, sidings, and extensions as said company may deem its interest to construct along and upon the right of way and depot grounds herein provided for."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PER DIEM SERVICE PENSION BILL.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions of the Hazlett Post, No. 81, Department of Ohio, Grand Army of the Republic, urging the passage of a per diem service pension bill, be read and printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object to printing memorials in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

PAYMENT OF LEGAL SERVICES RENDERED CERTAIN INDIANS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2917) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to pay from their own funds for certain legal services rendered the "Old Settlers" or Western Cherokee Indians.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of that part of the fund of the "Old Settlers" or Western Cherokee Indians set apart by said Indians for expenses incidental to their claim against the United States, the sum of $8,300.86 to Reese H. Voorhees and John Paul Jones, for professional services rendered said Indians in defending said fund, upon proof of the full performance of the said services called for by their contract.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In lines 10 and 11 strike out the words "upon proof of the full performance of the said services called for by their contract."

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask for an explanation of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Washington will be permitted to make an explanation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the report, I think, fully explains this bill. I ask that it be read. This claim is for services rendered under contract. The contract was fully complied with by these attorneys in securing the preservation of this fund, and was satisfactory to everybody interested.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report will be read.

The report (by Mr. DOOLITTLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 2917, respectfully submit the following report:

This bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay, out of a fund in his hands owned by certain Indians, for legal services rendered said Indians in preserving said fund to them.

It is a matter of extreme simplicity and unassailable merit. The facts are these:

After about twenty years of pendency, a claim made by the "Old Settlers" or Western Cherokee Indians against the United States was adjudged in their favor by the courts, and on August 23, 1894, $800,386.31 was appropriated by Congress in payment of the judgment. Of the amount which should be finally recovered the Indians had set apart, in many annual councils, 35 per cent to meet the expenses incident to the prosecution and final settlement of the claim. During the long pendency of the claim a large number of persons had been employed by the Old Settlers to aid in its prosecution. Of these some had died, having performed their contracts in small part only; some had abandoned their employment after small service, and some had rendered no service whatever. It was anxiously feared by the Indians that many unjust demands would be made on them for compensation where service had not been rendered, or for greater compensation than the service actually rendered merited. To protect their fund from this anticipated raid upon it, the Indians, in council at Tahlequah, Ind. T., on June 29, 1891, passed the following resolution:

"Moved that the sum of 1 per cent out of the 35 per cent be allowed Jones & Voorhees, attorneys, of Washington, D. C., to defend to a final termination the interests of the Old Settlers against all spurious, unfinished, or unreasonable claims by attorneys or other persons claiming to have rendered services in securing or aiding in the collection of the Old Settler claim. Carried."

Based upon the resolution, a contract was made with Mr. Jones and Mr. Voorhees November 20, 1891, on behalf of the Indians, by which they undertook the defense of the Indians and the fund, when recovered, against all improper and unjust demands.

The fears of the Indians of unrighteous exactions did not exceed the reality of the attempts made upon them. Claims for fees were filed against their fund in the Interior Department in great number, aggregating in amount over $500,000.

Every claim made which was not admitted to be just by the Indians was contested by Mr. Voorhees and vigorously fought, the work actually done being the searching for evidence and the building up of records, briefing, and oral arguments. This work covered months, and was very onerous in character.

As the result of the fight so made the cost of the prosecution of the claim was reduced from the $500,000 demanded to about $180,000. The amount which, under the law, the Secretary had the power to pay out for the prosecution was the 35 per cent set apart by the Indians, or about $280,000. The amount actually saved, therefore, to the Indians by this defense was about $100,000.

Your committee finds that the services called for by the contract have been very efficiently and fully performed; the Indians have received the services; the services have borne generous fruit. On every consideration these gentlemen are entitled to the stipulated compensation, and peculiarly so since it is to be paid out of the money preserved to the Indians by the services for which payment is asked.

Upon application to the Interior Department for its payment, it was held by the Secretary that he was without authority, under the existing law, to pay for this particular service; that his authority was limited to the payment for services rendered in securing the judgment and appropriation of the money, and that it did not extend to payment for services rendered in preserving the money to the Indians and securing its actual payment to them.

Your committee recommend, therefore, that the bill do pass as amended by your committee, namely, with line 10, beginning at the word "upon," and line 11 struck out.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. TALBERT. I demand the regular order.

UNITED STATES INSURANCE COMPANIES IN GERMANY.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio presents a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows;

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution calling for copies of all correspondence between this Government and the Government of Germany relating to the exclusion of life insurance companies of the United States from transacting business in Germany, begs leave to report the same and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to transmit to the House copies of all correspondence between this Government and the Government of Germany relating to the exclusion of life insurance companies of the United States from transacting business in Germany.

The resolution was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out in page 16, line 10, after the words "Provided further," the words "That the entire service of gas lighting authorized under this appropriation shall be let, after due advertisement, to the lowest responsible bidder therefor."

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I expect all are ready to vote on this amendment, but I want just a word before that vote is taken. On yesterday the mover of the amendment to strike out this proviso, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], while he disclaimed all intention of aspersing the Committee on Appropriations, spoke of this provision as what would be termed up in the Pennsylvania legislature as a "snake."

I tried yesterday afternoon, Mr. Chairman, to get the floor for the purpose of paying my respects to this "snake," but the debate waxed so hot and furious that I could not do so without displacing other gentlemen who wished to be heard, and debate was carried on to the very time of adjournment. I then thought it was perhaps better I did not obtain the floor, because it occurred to me that during the night the gentleman from Pennsylvania might think better of this uncanny allusion to the committee and strike it from the public RECORD; in short, I hoped that in the darkness and stillness of the night this serpent might crawl away out of sight and hearing and leave no trail behind him; but this morning I find the reptile in the RECORD, and not only that, but he is in the morning papers also.

Now, for just a moment, I want to see what kind of a "snake" this is, because it seems that not every quality about the serpent is harmful to man. We are told that those who looked upon the serpent of brass in the wilderness lived and did not die. This "serpent" that the committee have brought in here—for that is what the gentleman calls it—when you take into account the increased service and the reduced price, presents a proposition to light the city of Washington for the coming year for just about one-half what we are paying now. That is the committee's "serpent," and as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so our committee are willing to stand in the attitude of lifting up this serpent (so called by the gentleman) before this House and the American people; and I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] to look upon it and be cured of just one-half the cost of lighting this city of Washington for the ensuing year, so far as the proportionate share of his constituents is concerned, and the people of the District also may look upon it as curing them of one-half of their expense of lighting the city.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the kind of serpent that our committee has brought in here. If the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania had not gone into the RECORD this morning I should not have alluded to it; but it is there, and I hope this Committee of the Whole will not lose sight of the fact which I have stated, but about which gentlemen who have opposed this measure have said nothing. Another quality may be attributed to this serpent: It seems to have charmed all these gentlemen into silence, so far as opposition to the price is concerned. Here they are as gentle as sucking doves, and to what can it be attributed, unless it be to the mysterious influence of this reptile brought in here by the Committee on Appropriations? [Laughter.]

Let me say further, Mr. Chairman, that while I believe members are now prepared to vote on this proposition, I want them to do it understandingly, knowing just what issue is at stake, because this bill is to go to another body and then to come back here, and in what form it may be returned no one can tell. The history of the District bill in the last session may throw some light on the possible fate of this one. The last District bill as originally passed by the House appropriated $145,000 for the gaslighting of the streets, at $20 per annum for each street lamp.

The Senate, by amendment, reduced the appropriation to $142,400 (the sum actually appropriated for the fiscal year 1895) and restored the price to $20.50 per lamp. The bill so amended came back here, and the House in conference agreed to it. The appropriation for electric lighting in the bill of last year as it passed the House was $54,000, and the price per lamp was reduced from 40 cents to 38 cents. The Senate reduced the appropriation to $47,000 and restored the price to 40 cents per lamp per night.

Now, note that in the House bill in both instances enlarged service was provided for, just as it is in this bill, but the Senate cut out the enlarged service, and, in each instance, gave these close corporations the business of lighting the city at the old rates, and the House in conference agreed to that change. Mr. Chairman, it remains to be seen whether the House will be controlled by the Senate in the final disposition of this question.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to a provision of existing law which has come to my notice this morning, and to say that if my view of it be correct, this advertisement for bids is unnecessary, because the Commissioners have full power in their hands to fix the price and to compel the gas company to furnish lights at the price so fixed. In the Statutes at Large of the Forty-fifth Congress, page 208, we find this:

And the said Commissioners are hereby authorized to fix the salaries to be paid to the officers and privates of the Metropolitan police until otherwise provided by law; and to require the Washington Gas Light Company to light the city lamps at such price as shall to the said Commissioners appear to be just and reasonable.

I can not find that that provision of law has been repealed. It is carried into the Revised Statutes and is found on page 200 of the Supplement, where the same language is used:

And to require the Washington Gas Light Company to light the city lamps at such price as shall to the said Commissioners appear to be just and reasonable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while I do not care about getting up a diversion here, yet, for the sake of obtaining a ruling upon the point, if it shall be in order when this other matter is disposed of, I will offer an amendment fixing the price at less than $16, in the form of a requirement that the gaslight company shall furnish the lights. I shall offer that amendment in order to test the question whether or not we have the power. Of course, if we have the power under the statute, as I think we have, then my amendment may be strictly in line with existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment striking out the proviso beginning on line 10, page 16, of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, in order to vote intelligently upon the question which is now coming before the House, I would like to know if the committee has agreed to amend this clause which it is proposed to strike out, so as to meet the objections raised by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. GROUT. We are perfectly willing that the amendment shall be admitted as proposed. Several members of the committee are present, and if any of them dissent, let them speak; but for my part, I am willing, and I understand that the committee are perfectly willing, to accept any amendment which will, perchance, make the provision more explicit.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, in further response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Mississippi, I desire to give notice that if this committee will vote down the proposition to strike out the proviso which the Committee on Appropriations propose, to the effect that "the entire service of gaslighting authorized under this appropriation shall be let, after due advertisement, to the lowest responsible bidder therefor," I will offer a further amendment in these words: "At a price not exceeding the price above limited."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked the question because I wanted to determine how I would vote myself. With an amendment like that coming from the committee I would vote against the motion to strike out, but without it I would vote for the motion. In this connection I would like to make a suggestion. If the committee will add the words, "Provided, That nothing herein shall be held to compel the Commissioners to accept any bid offered," the matter will be guarded perhaps a little better than in the other way. However, with the amendment suggested, I will vote with the committee.

The question being taken on the motion to strike out the proviso, it was rejected.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If it be in order, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, beginning at the bottom of page 15, the following:
"Provided, That no more than $16 per annum for each street lamp shall be paid for gas or oil, lighting, extinguishing, repairing, painting, and cleaning, under any expenditure provided for in this act."
And insert the following:
"Provided, That the Washington Gas Light Company shall light each street lamp in the city of Washington for the sum of $12 per light per year."

Mr. GROUT. It is my belief that this service can be rendered for the sum named in the amendment; and speaking for myself individually, I shall not offer any objection to the proposition.

Mr. PITNEY. I hope the gentleman from Ohio who offers that amendment——

Mr. BABCOCK. I raise a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes rather late.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to the point of order. I am glad to have the question raised whether under the statute we can take this action. I should be glad to know whether we have this power or not. I do not object to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] will state his point of order.

Mr. BABCOCK. The point of order I make is that this is not only new legislation, but that it changes existing law. The present law fixes the price per lamp at $20.50. This amendment proposes to make the sum $12.

Mr. GROUT. This is only for the current year.

Mr. CANNON. I hope that this point of order will not be sustained, if the Chair is inclined to sustain it, until there has been proper hearing of the question. Still I do not desire to burden the Chair with discussion unless it be necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to have the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] refer to the law which the proposed amendment contravenes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I should think some reference to the law would be necessary in order to sustain the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has requested the gentleman from Wisconsin to refer to the law which fixes the price at $20.50.

Mr. BABCOCK. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, then, on the amendment.

Mr. TERRY. I suggest that the language of the amendment should be "not exceeding $12."

Mr. NORTHWAY. I should be glad to ascertain if there is any law in force which prevents our adopting such a requirement as this.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been withdrawn.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Otherwise I should not feel at liberty to offer an amendment which would seem to contradict what the committee has undertaken to do in fixing a limit. I only wanted to raise the question whether we have the power to make this requirement.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PITNEY. I think I am in sympathy with the object which the gentleman from Ohio has in view, yet I do not believe this amendment is calculated to fulfill that object. I hope, therefore, he will modify the amendment or that it will be voted down.

Mr. DOCKERY. Did I understand the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. GROUT] to express himself as willing to accept the amendment?

Mr. GROUT. No; I did not say I would not accept it. I said I believed gas could be furnished at the price named in the amendment. Still I think we had perhaps best keep ourselves on conservative ground and adhere to the present limit, $16. We really have no definite knowledge, and can get no definite knowledge, as to what this gas costs. If we should go into an investigation we probably should not know much more about it when we got through than we do now. It is all a matter of speculation.

In my judgment, it would be well to stand by the bill as the committee has brought it in, as the measure is the result of the deliberations of the full committee, in which all the members were finally agreed. I believe, therefore, it is wiser to stand where we are. If we should be able to retain, when this bill becomes a law, even a large fragment of the reforms which the bill proposes, we shall have accomplished a good work. My great object is to have the House understand the matter now, because when the bill comes back to us from the Senate we may be in more of a hurry than we are at present and there may not be so much time for explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, I will at present withdraw the amendment, upon the suggestion of the gentleman in charge of the bill, as I do not wish unnecessarily to antagonize the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. GROUT. To make this clause satisfactory to all gentlemen, and in order to keep faith with the assurance that an effort would be made to accomplish that result, I now send to the desk to be read an amendment which I think will be satisfactory to all, and in which the committee, so far as it has been consulted, has agreed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the word "therefor," in line 13 of page 16, the following words:
"Provided, That no contract shall be made for gaslight at a price exceeding the rate hereinbefore specified."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer on my own behalf the amendment I send to the desk, to come in after the amendment just adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Washington Gas Light Company and all other gaslight companies doing business in the District of Columbia, are authorized to charge and collect, after the passage of this act, for illuminating gas furnished to and paid for by the Government of the United States and other consumers in the Dis trict of Columbia, at the rate of not exceeding 75 cents per thousand cubic feet, except that gas consumed in public lamps for lighting streets, highways, and public grounds in the District of Columbia shall be paid for at such rates as Congress may from time to time prescribe: Provided, That if consumers, other than the Government, shall not pay monthly any gas bill within ten days after the same shall have been presented, said company may charge and collect from said consumer so failing to pay said bill as aforesaid $1 per thousand cubic feet for the gas furnished to said consumer during said month.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say, in connection with the amendment, that it is the exact language of a bill, so far as it appears in that amendment, which passed the House during the last Congress, except that I have fixed the price for gas to individual consumers at a maximum of 75 cents instead of $1 per thousand cubic feet, as was fixed in the bill to which I refer. The amendment also reserves to the Government the right to fix its own price for the service rendered for lighting the streets, highways, and public grounds. It also authorizes a charge of $1 per thousand in certain cases to delinquent customers.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, is that not subject to the point of order?

Mr. DOCKERY. The point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is now too late to interpose the point of order.

Mr. HILL. I desire to make the point of order if permissible.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri was recognized and proceeded to debate the amendment, after which it was too late to interpose an objection.

Mr. PITNEY. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For electric arc lighting, including necessary inspection, in those streets now lighted with electric arc lights in the city of Washington, and for necessary extensions of such service, $43,600: Provided, That not more than 28 cents per night shall be paid for any electric arc light burning from forty-five minutes after sunset to forty-five minutes before sunrise and operated wholly by means of underground wires; and each arc light shall be of not less than 1,000 actual candlepower, and no part of this appropriation shall be used for electric lighting by means of wires that may exist on or over any of the streets or avenues of the city of Washington: Provided further, That the entire service of electric lighting authorized under this appropriation shall be let, after due advertisement, to the lowest responsible bidder therefor: Provided further, That in case such lowest responsible bidder be not provided with an underground system of wires and conduits in the streets and other places covered by such service the commissioners of the District of Columbia may, under such reasonable conditions as they may prescribe, authorize such bidder to lay down an approved system of underground conduits and wires for electric lighting in and along such streets and other public places as may be necessary for said service; such privilege as may be granted hereunder to be revocable at the will of Congress, without compensation.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, under the last clause of paragraph 2 of Rule XXI, upon all after the word "therefor" in line 14 of that paragraph, for the same reason stated in the point made yesterday in reference to the portion of the bill on the opposite page.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. PITNEY. I do, Mr. Chairman.

The extreme importance of this proviso, and, as the Committee on Appropriations think, the unfortunate result which will follow in case the proviso is held to be inadmissible under the rules of the House as attached to a bill of this character, make it proper to say two or three words about it.

I think, and I respectfully submit to the consideration of the Chair, that the case presented by this point of order is essentially different from that upon which the present occupant of the chair ruled yesterday. It is different with regard to the law; for the law regulating the matter of electric lighting differs from that which governs the gaslight company in this city. We think further, and I beg to submit to your consideration, that while the Chair was correct in his recollection that there was a ruling upon a point of order raised on the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia in the Fifty-first Congress, the Chair was incorrect in regard to the particular point raised at that time, and incorrect also in regard to the reasons which governed that decision.

And this is an illustration of the danger of deciding a case without argument on the point in question, for the precedent from the Fifty-first Congress was not mentioned in the debate on this floor yesterday upon the point of order then submitted by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER]. I have taken pains to look it up this morning before the meeting of the House, and I find that the proviso ruled out in the Fifty-first Congress on the point of order was a very different proviso—that it had a very different scope and purpose—from the proviso now the subject of discussion. The proviso then in question was attached to that part of the bill which granted an appropriation for the maintenance of the public electric lighting in this city, and the proviso was in these words:

And no overhead wires for public or private electric lighting shall be permitted on or over any of the streets or avenues of the cities of Washington or Georgetown after September 30, 1890.

Mr. Chairman, at the time that appropriation bill was under consideration before the Committee of the Whole in the Fifty-first Congress, the streets of Washington were filled with overhead wires strung through the streets for the purpose of serving telephone and electric light companies and telegraph companies. They were in the streets under some sort of right or privilege, vested or temporary. The effect of this provision, which was the subject of the point of order then, was not limited to the wires which furnished the electric lights. The proviso went to the extent of abolishing all electric-light wires then in the streets, whether they served the public electric lights or not; whether they had any relation to the party contracting to furnish the electric lights under the appropriation bill or not. Therefore it was legislation taking away rights which had accrued to the owners of the several companies under previous legislation, or under previous license from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and, a Mr. BURROWS of Michigan being in the chair, the point of order was raised by Mr. Atkinson in these words:

Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against so much of this section as begins in line 24 with the following words:

"And no overhead wires for public or private electric lighting shall be permitted on or over any of the streets or avenues of the cities of Washington or Georgetown after September 30, 1890."

The point I make is, first, that the Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and, second, that this changes the existing law.

Then, after considerable debate, the Chair sustained the point of order and excluded the provision from the bill, but gave no reason for the ruling. The reason, I think, however, is manifest from the somewhat protracted argument that was had on the floor of this House in Committee of the Whole on that occasion. It was based upon the state of facts to which I have alluded, that there were electric lights already existing, and wires already existing, strung over the streets, some of which wires served the electric lights, and others of which served private parties, and the proposition was to abolish all those wires. I think it was properly held in that case that that was a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman before him the ruling that was subsequently made, on page 468?

Mr. PITNEY. That is the very ruling to which I have called the attention of the Chair. The ruling was made on page 468 of volume 103 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that session.

Mr. GROUT. With no reasons given?

Mr. PITNEY. No reasons were given, but the grounds of the ruling, as I said before, are manifest from the debate which took place before the ruling was made. For instance, Mr. McComas, the chairman of the subcommittee which had prepared the District of Columbia bill, and which had charge of the measure in the Committee of the Whole on that occasion, said, on page 468, just before the ruling:

This proposition ought to have the sympathy of the committee. We are striking here at these telegraph and electric-light companies, who usurp the air and fret it with wire. We want these wires placed underground. We have been trying to do it for four years, but it has not yet been fully done. I give notice that I am going to try again and again to have these electric-light and telegraph companies required to place their wires underground; and I do not think this question should be disposed of on this point of order.

That was before the adoption of the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, and they were proceeding under the rules of the Fiftieth Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the proposition here is different, and I recur again to the language of the second paragraph of Rule XXI of the rules of the Fifty-fourth Congress—the present Congress—which paragraph is invoked by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] in raising the point of order. Not only the last two lines of that paragraph, but the whole paragraph, ought to be read for a correct understanding of the rule as it applies to the proviso now under consideration:

2. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

Mr. Chairman, the last branch of that section relates to new substantive legislation, and the previous branch of the section relates to the limitations which are admissible in appropriation bills of this character. Therefore, if we can find that this appropriation before the House is for a purpose already authorized by law, and is in pursuance of the policy of the existing law relating to the District of Columbia, the provision is not subject to the point of order, because it is an appropriation for the continuance of an object already made lawful.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is too plain for argument that the lighting of the streets of this city is a purpose not only permissible by law, but required by law. It is a necessary police regulation. It is a necessary measure for the good and welfare of the people of the District. And in the performance of this duty which is imposed upon the District Commissioners they must adopt, not the old-fashioned lighting, but the best method which can be obtained in the progress of invention; and so they have properly gone into the electric-lighting system for the lighting of some of the principal streets of Washington.

Mr. Chairman, there never has been a substantive act of legislation passed by Congress since Congress took control of the matter which has created an electric light company or has given a franchise to an electric light company, or which has prohibited an electric light company from putting subways beneath the pavement. And there is not a line in the organic act of the District, or in any act now applicable to the District, which prohibits Congress at any time, by substantive acts, or by incidental provision on appropriation bills, from providing that the wires to serve the lights for which they spend the money shall be placed beneath the pavement instead of being strung overhead.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is an immense difference between this section and the clause decided yesterday. That decision was based on a special charter granted under the old régime, in "the good old times before the war," to this gas company; and I will say, in passing, that there seems to be a general belief that we are getting the same kind of gas that was furnished before the war; whereas in regard to the electric light the question does not depend upon a charter, but upon the right of the present company, arising from the same sort of incidental grant on previous appropriation bills, that we now ask to have incorporated in this appropriation bill.

The first of these acts was that which I mentioned yesterday, passed in the year 1888. The act provided "that the Commissioners might, under such reasonable conditions as they might prescribe, authorize wires of any company then operating to be laid under the streets." That power was limited in point of time to the termination of the then existing Congress, and the limitation was subsequently extended. The limitation has now expired by lapse of time; but at that time there grew up a practice of appropriating money from year to year for electric lighting, and the language of the annual appropriation bills was this:

For maintaining existing service and necessary extensions—and the only law by which the electric light company has extended its wires is under that grant incidental to appropriations namely, the right to make extensions necessary to the then existing service.

We have in the now current law, the appropriation bill now in force, and under which the streets are lighted, or ought to be lighted, these very words, namely:

Maintaining existing service and necessary extensions.

It will appear, therefore, to be the settled policy of Congress in regard to this matter to adopt this system of lighting upon the principal streets, and to make extensions of that system in other streets, so fast as the needs of the District may require. We have the object already embodied in the law of the District by the annual appropriation bills. It is therefore now a lawful object; and I undertake to say, sir, that if we do not put in this proviso granting an express right to lay down conduits, yet the rest of the proviso would authorize the Commissioners to grant that privilege; and this limitation upon the power of the Commissioners is provided in order that the power they now have to allow wires put down shall be exercised in a reasonable manner and under reasonable restrictions, and that such privileges as may be granted by them under that power shall be revocable at the will of Congress without compensation.

Again, if these acts and this course of practice, and the general duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to take care of the streets and control them, do not create this power of lighting the streets with electricity as one of the incidental means necessary to accomplish that purpose, then there is no law upon the subject. We have an absence of statute or other law, and so there is no "existing law" to be changed, and it is only provisions changing existing law which are out of order in an appropriation bill.

Now, I do not want to weary the Chair or the committee with further argument upon this question, except to say that the question is a very important one, and that it is only by means of competition that we can have a proper service at a reasonable price.

The present law under which the streets are now lighted by electricity provides that "not more than 40 cents per night shall be paid for any electric arc light burning every night from sunset to sunrise and operated by means of underground wires." Last year, when the District of Columbia appropriation bill was first framed, it proposed a rate of 38 cents per light. I believe that is the proposition that was first laid before the House, but afterwards, in the conference committee, the rate was raised to 40 cents. Previous to that time, in the Fifty-second Congress or in the first session of the Fifty-third, the company had made a fight against having the price reduced below 50 cents per night per light, and yet, in the hearings before the subcommittee which prepared the bill now under consideration, the mere intimation of competition caused the company to reduce their price down to 28 cents per light per night. I ought not to say, perhaps, that that was literally their own offer, but they expressed themselves as willing to come down to $100 per year, which is just a shade less than 28 cents per night per light.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in discussing this matter, I have not used any intemperate language, I have not raised any antimonopoly cry merely for effect; I have not been talking to the galleries nor using my hat as a speaking trumpet. I have addressed myself to this matter as a pure business proposition. I recognize the moral claims of a company like this which has entered upon a new field as a pioneer and blazed out the way for others to follow. This company was the first to introduce this underground system in Washington. But, Mr. Chairman, they have a valuable franchise; they have a franchise that did not cost them anything except the putting down of the plant. They serve the people at a profit to themselves, and it is no more than right that they should be reduced to a reasonable profit. Now, the new company come in and say, "If you will give us this franchise we will enter the field as competitors;" and competition, while it may be sometimes used as a means of oppression, would in this case be only reasonable competition, because the old company have the advantage of previous possession of the field, they have their private customers, and even if they should lose the public contract the new company could not oppress them. Therefore we think it is a reasonable proposition that this new company shall be permitted to come in and make a bid for this important public service.

With these remarks I submit that the ruling of the Chair on yesterday does not apply to this case; that so far as the ruling depended on the precedent cited from the Fifty-first Congress, it was founded upon a precedent not applicable to this particular case, and that there is no provision of existing law which this proviso interferes with; but that, on the contrary, this is an appropriation in continuation of a public object already declared to be proper and lawful and already in progress.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] thoroughly approves and proves my contention in relation to the point of order. He admits that this is new legislation, and legislation for a purpose—a purpose which might be appropriate in a separate bill, but not in an appropriation act.

In relation to the general argument which he has made here as to the granting of permits, I wish to say that the supreme court of the District of Columbia, I have been informed, has already handed down a decision entirely opposed to all the gentleman's arguments, which decision has been delivered since the Chair yesterday, with justice, ruled out the amendment on the point of order. I submit the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The proviso is:

That in case such lowest responsible bidder be not provided with an underground system of wires and conduits in the streets and other places covered by such service the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, under such reasonable conditions as they may prescribe, authorize such bidder to lay down an approved system of underground conduits and wires for electric lighting in and along such streets and other public places as may be necessary for said service, such privilege as may be granted hereunder to be revocable at the will of Congress without compensation.

This proviso does not materially differ from the provision that was ruled out on the point of order yesterday. In order to carry it out the same disturbance of the streets would be required, the same digging and interference with public travel, and in that respect it does not differ substantially from the paragraph that was ruled out. The Chair does not understand that any provision of law has been cited which makes it lawful for any electric lighting company to dig up the streets of the city of Washington, especially any company which may happen to be the lowest bidder—a new company organized for that purpose. Any such interference with the streets and any authorization of such an interference with the streets of the city would be, in the opinion of the Chair, a change of existing law.

The Chair quoted yesterday a decision made in the Fifty-first Congress which has been criticised this morning. On returning to that question the Chair's recollection is confirmed. In the first place, the bill upon which the question rose was considered under the rules of the Fiftieth Congress, and the rule of the Fiftieth Congress upon that subject is in these words:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The particular clause in that bill to which the point of order was directed was this:

And no overhead wires for public or private electric lighting shall be permitted on or over any of the streets or avenues of the cities of Washington and Georgetown after September 30, 1890.

That was confined exclusively to wires for public or private electric lighting, and did not apply to telegraph or telephone wires or to any other wires than those belonging to this special class. The point of order was made against that provision that it was a change of existing law. The Chair yesterday cited that case, not upon that particular ground, but because it was contended here that the provision then under consideration was in order because it was simply a limitation upon the expenditure of public money, a limitation of the appropriation made in the bill to a particular object. It was upon that point that the Chair quoted the decision made in the Fifty-first Congress.

In the Fifty-first Congress the point was made by those who contended in favor of the provision in the bill that it was simply a limitation upon the expenditures of the Government. But at that time, notwithstanding the objection, it was directly held by the occupant of the chair that it was not merely a limitation upon the expenditure of the public money and was therefore out of order as being in contravention of the existing law and as changing existing law. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For electric arc lighting, including necessary inspection, in those streets now lighted with electric arc lights in the city of Washington, and for necessary extensions of such service, $43,600: Provided, That not more than 28 cents per night shall be paid for any electric arc light burning from forty-five minutes after sunset to forty-five minutes before sunrise, and operated wholly by means of underground wires, and each arc light shall be of not less than 1,000 actual candlepower, and no part of this appropriation shall be used for electric lighting by means of wires that may exist on or over any of the streets or avenues of the city of Washington: Provided further, That the entire service of electric lighting authorized under this appropriation shall be let, after due advertisement, to the lowest responsible bidder therefor: Provided further, That in case such lowest responsible bidder be not provided with an underground system of wires and conduits in the streets and other places covered by such service, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, under such reasonable conditions as they may prescribe, authorize such bidder to lay down an approved system of underground conduits and wires for electric lighting in and along such streets and other public places as may be necessary for said service; such privilege as may be granted hereunder to be revocable at the will of Congress without compensation.

Mr. GROUT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "therefor," in line 14 of page 17, insert—

"Provided further, That no contract shall be made for electric arc lighting at a price exceeding the rate hereinbefore specified."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROUT. I also offer the further amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert after the amendment last adopted the following:

"That hereafter the United States Electric Lighting Company, or any other electric lighting company doing business in the District of Columbia, shall not charge or collect from the United States or any other consumer of electric arc or incandescent light, or electricity for power, prices exceeding 75 per cent of the price charged for such light and power on the 1st day of January, 1896, in the said District of Columbia."

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, this puts the provision in regard to electric lighting on a level with that relating to gas.

Mr. DOCKERY. And a very wise provision it is, let me suggest.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the plans and specifications for each of said buildings, and for all other buildings provided for in this act, shall be prepared by the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia, and shall be approved by the Architect of the Capitol and the Commissioners of the District, and said buildings shall be constructed by the Commissioners in conformity therewith.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

After line 7, page 25, insert:

"For the purpose of purchasing a sufficient number of United States flags to place one on every schoolhouse in the District of Columbia on school days and during school hours, the sum of $1,000, to be expended by the school trustees of the District, and to be immediately available."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that this amendment is subject to a point of order; at any rate, I have no desire to make such a point. I may suggest, however, that I am under the impression that most of the schoolhouses of this District are now furnished with flags. The United States flag is a very proper flag to be publicly displayed; and if there is any place on earth where it ought to be displayed, it is perhaps especially the District of Columbia. Whether it is wise to make this provision for furnishing flags to the schools when most of these schools are already supplied, the flags having been furnished by small subscriptions made by the children and the parents, I am not sure. My observation has been that those good things that cost something of personal effort are generally most highly prized.

There has been much of legislation throughout the country touching the placing of flags over every schoolhouse. It has been claimed that a requirement to have the flag exhibited under all circumstances over all schoolhouses tends to weaken respect for it from mere familiarity. Some enterprising citizens in some portions of the United States have, as others believe, run wild upon the subject of United States flags, and at their own expense have put a representation of that flag on every article they have manufactured. They have used it in connection with their business for advertising purposes so as to have it ever present in connection with the promotion of such business. Now, some people have objected to that, and I think there has been some legislation to prohibit it.

We have the flag displayed over this wing of the Capitol when the House is in session and over the Senate wing when the other body is in session; and I believe it is always displayed over the central part of the Capitol building.

Whether it would really promote patriotic sentiment to begin now with an appropriation of $1,000 for the coming fiscal year to be paid from the Treasury and the revenues of the District so as to provide, in addition to the flags floating over the public buildings, that the flag shall float over all the schoolhouses, I am quite sure I do not know.

If I thought that this provision would beget patriotic sentiment or aspiration which would not otherwise exist in the heart of any child, I would say, in my country's name, let the provision be adopted, whether it costs $1,000 or $10,000; for later on, no doubt, the cost will be $10,000. But in the promotion of a sound sentiment that otherwise would not exist the cost is of not much consequence.

Mr. Chairman, it has been claimed that some of the makers and dealers in flags have insisted on their universal use at the public expense. But how far we are justified in using the public money for this purpose when in the main heretofore patriotic sentiment has caused the flag to float quite generally throughout the country and has prompted nearly 3,000,000 people within this generation to peril their lives in its defense, I do not know.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I only want to inquire which side the gentleman is on. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Well, I am just trying to find out. [Renewed laughter.] I want to find what the object of this appropriation is, and its necessity, and then I can understand it a little better.

I will say again, though, Mr. Chairman, if it is believed by a majority of the House that, to promote sentiments of patriotism in the breast of the growing generation, or in the adult generation, that otherwise would not exist there, then I should say make the appropriation.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I have no rhetoric to ventilate on this subject. I simply desire to state briefly the reasons that suggested the amendment.

I understand that by private contribution on the part of the pupils of some of our public schools in the District of Columbia United States flags have been purchased and float over some of the buildings, and that there are other schools where the pupils are not able to purchase them. This is a proposition simply to place the United States flag over these public buildings owned by the United States in this District, over which it does not now float. They are the buildings occupied by the young people in the District, and there, if anywhere, should be cultivated the patriotic sentiment to which the gentleman from Illinois refers. In this we are only doing what a great many of the States have done for their public schools by State authority; and if I mistake not, one of these States is the great and glorious State of the gentleman from Illinois. At least from eight to a dozen States have made already some provision for placing the United States flag over the public schoolhouses in their limits. The State of Pennsylvania is one; Illinois, I understand, is another, and from eight to a dozen have already taken steps in this direction.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You can count Ohio in that category.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I am informed also that Ohio has done so, as has Vermont, Connecticut, Montana, Iowa, Michigan, South Dakota, and several other States; and the proposition here is simply that the United States, within the limited space of the District of Columbia, shall at the expense of $1,000 float the flag of the country over every schoolhouse in the District where it does not now float, and in doing this we will do simply what a dozen or more of the States have done in their respective localities.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask the gentleman if he can tell us how many schoolhouses there are in the District of Columbia where the flag does not now float?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Well, I do not know exactly. There are perhaps somewhere between 100 and 150 in all, but how many have the flag I do not know.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman, I think, is mistaken in the number.

Mr. CANNON. What will the flags cost?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I am unable to state exactly, but somewhere between $10 and $15, I should imagine. I only make that as a guess, however.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, no; they will not cost that much. Not exceeding $4, perhaps.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I am informed that I made my estimate too high, and that the flags will not cost more than from four to six dollars each.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If I remember correctly, when Mr. Harrison was President of the United States he ordered that the United States flag should be placed on all of the public buildings in the District of Columbia. Did not that order also include the public schools?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I understand that it did not, and the amendment I have offered simply proposes to enforce that regulation of the President by providing that these flags shall float over all of the public schoolhouses of the District which are the property of the United States.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not opposing the resolution at all; but I know that under that order the flag was placed on a great many of the public buildings in the District of Columbia; and I would like to ask the gentleman out of what fund the money came that paid for the flags which were placed under that order.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I am unable to answer the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thought possibly that there might be a contingent fund in each of the Departments that could be utilized for that purpose.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I have no knowledge of the fact, and am unable to say.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I understood correctly the answer of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] as to the number of schoolhouses not floating the United States flag in this District.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I regret to say that I am not able to state positively, and can only give an approximate guess at about 100.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand there are only about 109 buildings in all, used for school purposes in the District of Columbia. This does not include, however, a few that are rented for that purpose.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I understand that there are about 130 of them in all.

Mr. DOCKERY. There are 109 belonging to the District, which cost the Government about two and a half million dollars; and there are a number of rented buildings used for this same purpose.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I do not think, as far as my information goes, that there are more than ten or fifteen that have the flag floating over them, but of this I have no definite knowledge.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me incredible that anyone should oppose this very proper amendment. The United States differs from all other countries on earth in its source of strength and power, from the fact that it has not been large armies, but a spirit of devotion and patriotism to the country and the country's flag that has made it the greatest, the most powerful, the most progressive, and the most respected nation on the globe. We have no standing armies like the powerful nations of Europe, costing as they do from sixty millions to two hundred millions of dollars a year. These great standing armies are their elements of strength; but a spirit of love for country is the element of strength in our land. Anything that can be done, whether it costs $1,000 or $10,000, to further and encourage this spirit, is a good thing to do, and whether the number of flags floating over the schoolhouses of the children of this District be 10, 15, or 500, it makes no difference. It is a matter of surprise to me that the law has not long ago provided for such a judicious expenditure. Had I known that the law did not provide for the purchase of flags for schoolhouses I should have offered the amendment myself.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will say to the gentleman, as I understand it, there are flags already on all of the public buildings.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman who has charge of the amendment says that there are not; that they are only on the school buildings where the scholars have clubbed together and furnished the money to buy them.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What has the flag of the country to do with the institution of schoolhouses, anyway?

Mr. WHEELER. It has a great deal to do with it, because the young scholars who are growing up to take our places and be the defenders of this country are inside those schools, and when they go out and look above the schoolhouse, let them look upon the flag of their country, which it may be their glorious privilege to stand under in battle in defense of their country some day. [Applause.]

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I feel that it is almost superfluous to attempt to amplify what has been so well said by my friend from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER]; but I am astonished to think that any one should object to having the national ensign, to having "Old Glory" float above every schoolhouse not only in the District of Columbia, but in every State of the Union.

Mr. CANNON. Who has objected?

Mr. WASHINGTON. There is an inspiration of patriotism in the flag that nothing else can give.

Its graceful folds curling in the gentle breeze, its bright stars shining in its field of blue, its stripes of red and white sparkling in the sunshine appeal to the hearts and imaginations of the boys and girls as they come to their morning recitations in a way which will be felt not only for that day, but all through life. The modern way of teaching is by object lessons. What grander object lesson in history than the flag which stands for our nationality and for our power. It recalls every hard-fought field for freedom's rights from Lexington to Yorktown; from Lundys Lane to New Orleans; from Vera Cruz to Mexico; from Bull Run to Appomattox.

It is our flag to love and cherish; to look upon with pride. It should float from sunrise to sunset over every schoolhouse and over every public building not only in the District of Columbia, but in every State and Territory in the Union. Nay, more, it should float over every dwelling where the patriot rears his family. There is no stain upon its folds, there is no sacrilege in its adoration.

The suggestion of cost ought not to weigh against the proposed amendment. The expenditure for the purchase of all the flags contemplated will not be great and can not be seriously felt. A flag of sufficient dimensions and suitable quality can be bought for five or six dollars. If a hundred flags should be required the whole cost need not exceed $500 or $600. The good to result therefrom can not be estimated by any calculation based upon dollars and cents. It is patriotism, devotion to country, the advancement of the general welfare by which alone we can measure the benefit to the rising generation by the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, just one word. I can not object to this appropriation. It has occurred to me that it perhaps might be somewhat less, for many of these schools have flags already, and the flags do not cost more than four or five dollars apiece, as I am informed. Probably not more than half the buildings are unprovided, and it might be done, perhaps, for half the money. We do not want to appropriate anything unnecessarily.

I can not object to this because in my own State, to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has alluded, many of the towns supply the schools with flags, and they have set apart the day preceding Memorial Day as Flag Day for the scholars in the public schools, and have recognized the idea that the public schools, which are the nurseries of freedom, should have over them the national flag. The public school is not a private institution, nor does it belong alone to a town, county, or State, but it really belongs to the United States.

There is, perhaps, a good argument in favor of letting the children of the schools provide themselves with flags, as is now done here, on the ground that it cultivates the spirit of patriotism to contribute the small sum necessary to purchase a flag and put it on the schoolhouse, and that in doing this the children would take a greater interest in it than if furnished at public expense. The children have been patriotic in many instances in this District in this way, and I am told that all the schoolhouses constructed within the last few years have flag poles ready to receive the flags. In many instances the children have set themselves patriotically to work to furnish the flags; but inasmuch as they furnish, themselves, many other things, such as libraries and pianos, it does not seem amiss that there should be a small appropriation for this purpose. It seems to me that this should be distinguished from the use of the flag for private advertising purposes, which many consider a desecration of it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do you believe these flags over the schoolhouses and educational institutions of our country are conducive to a patriotic spirit?

Mr. GROUT. I do, most emphatically.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why was it, then, that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], who was educated under the flag at West Point, went into the rebellion in 1861?

Mr. WHEELER. Because his patriotic devotion to his own people sent him there.

Mr. GROUT. Ah, but he has come back to the flag, and sees Old Glory to-day as never before.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The question asked by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] is one of the questions this country has never been able to answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORSE. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that this amendment will prevail. In my own State the custom is well-nigh universal to fly the flag over the schoolhouses. Persons who visit European countries from our own country, especially in England, find a Government building in almost every town, village, and hamlet, and over it flies the English flag that stands for Old England, for the Queen of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, and Empress of India. It is educational. It inspires patriotism; and I think that this amendment is a wise and just one. I believe it is worth all it will cost to teach the children in the public schools of this District to love the old flag, the flag for which our fathers fought the long and bloody war of the Revolution, the flag which Jackson defended behind the cotton bales on the plains of Chalmette, the flag which General Scott defended at Lundys Lane, the flag that General Taylor carried into Mexico, the flag baptized anew on a hundred fields fresh within the memory of us all, the flag above your head, Mr. Chairman, the old flag, whose azure blue, set with stars, symbolizes the starry firmament of God. School children should be taught lessons of patriotism; should be taught to love their country and their flag. Under other forms of government than our own the affections of the people cluster around the king, queen, czar, or emperor, the throne, and he or she who sits thereon. Having no such center of attraction in our own free Government, the affections of our people naturally cluster around the flag. Other people cry out "Long live the king," "Long live the queen," "Long live the czar." Let us teach our children to look at Old Glory on the schoolhouse, and cry out "Long live the Republic."

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I trust that all those who have any doubt of their patriotic sympathy may have leave to print their remarks.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. In order that there may be no question of appropriating too much money, I modify my amendment by making it read "$1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary." I do not desire that any more money shall be appropriated than is necessary.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOR METROPOLITAN POLICE.

For major and superintendent, $3,300; captain, $1,800; 3 lieutenants, inspectors, at $1,500 each; chief clerk, who shall also be property clerk, $2,000; clerk, $1,500; clerk, $900; 4 surgeons of the police and fire departments, at $540 each; for additional compensation for 12 privates detailed for special service in the detection and prevention of crime, $2,880, or so much thereof as may be necessary; 9 lieutenants, $1,320 each; 31 sergeants, at $1,140 each; 261 privates, class 1, at $900 each; 194 privates, class 2, at $1,080 each; 20 station keepers, at $750; each; 8 laborers, at $480 each; laborer in charge of the morgue, $680; messenger, $700; messenger, $500; major and superintendent, mounted, $240; captain, mounted, $240; 43 lieutenants, sergeants, and privates, mounted, at $240 each; 21 drivers, at $480 each; and 3 police matrons, at $600 each; in all, $553,480.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman in charge of the bill to make some explanation of this provision and give the committee some idea of the cost of the force. It looks to me as if there was a very large sum of money appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, I will say that the present police force is 475 men, including the officers and privates, to which we have made an addition of just 25 privates, and the estimate was for 125 new men.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman explain why this increase is necessary?

Mr. GROUT. Well, sir, Major Moore testified before us that a large number of the force were now on detached service, or detailed service, I think he called it, at various points in the District, and that there was a real necessity for that increase of the force. Some were about the Capitol, some at the White House, and some elsewhere.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Twelve of them about the Capitol.

Mr. GROUT. They are about the grounds outside; not, of course, in the Capitol itself, but the grounds fall under the charge of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman explain to us, further, as to what number of men are here for the protection of the public grounds—about the Capitol, for instance?

Mr. GROUT. My memory is that there are four on the Capitol grounds.

Mr. HEPBURN. And where are these other details?

Mr. GROUT. One of the details is at the White House, where there are 26 policemen, working in three reliefs. This is only about 1 to every 600 in population, and in other cities the average is 1 to every 500.

In further reply to the gentleman from Iowa, I will state that the detail at the White House is larger than heretofore, about twice as large as it has been in former years, as the Major stated. He said that details have to be made for receptions, and a large number of the committee thought we would provide at least 25; but I can not say that we were entirely clear that that would fully meet the necessities of the service, nor were we clear that more were needed.

Miscellaneous: For rent of stable, $120.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would ask consent that we go back to that portion of the bill that relates to the telegraph and telephone service. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether the city of Washington or the District of Columbia owns a telegraph and telephone plant here? I find nearly $27,000 of appropriation for this telegraph and telephone service. Does the District own this plant?

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, certainly; I have forgotten the number of miles, but the gentleman, if he will reflect for a moment, will see that the police department and fire department could hardly operate effectually without this service; and it is for the renewal of a portion of that line that a portion of this sum is given. The committee inquired into the matter very particularly, and they raised—I remember it was the case with myself, and I am sure it was the case with the other members of the committee—the question thoroughly as to whether this could not be delayed; but the understanding was that these poles were old. They were put up sixteen or seventeen years ago, and many of them were liable to fall over at any moment. It was therefore thought by the committee that this particular work of renewing should be entered upon, and could not safely be delayed.

Mr. HEPBURN. But, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will but think for a moment of the prices charged—$100 an instrument here is a sum that is equal to the cost of 270 instruments. Is not that enormous for the use of the city?

Mr. GROUT. What line in the bill does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. HEPBURN. I refer to the aggregate of this appropriation, $10,800, $11,000, and $5,000. They aggregate nearly $27,000.

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman call attention to the line?

Mr. HEPBURN. Line 16, page 28, line 23 on the same page, and line 4 on the next page.

Mr. GROUT. That in line 16, the twenty-eighth page, is for the service of the superintendent and the operators, and that which you see at the bottom of the page is for supplies, for new batteries, and battery supplies, telephone renewals, purchase of poles, and so on. These instruments are not owned by the District, but they have to be rented.

The next item, for renewing city lines, is the cost of putting up the poles I spoke of a minute ago as being ready to fall down. Possibly too high a sum is allowed here for these instruments that the gentleman speaks of. I can not say. The committee did not take testimony or make any specific inquiry as to that, but accepted the judgment of those who were before them, the persons in charge of this branch of the service, who, it was supposed, would suitably guard the interests of the public and give the committee correct information.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does the gentleman know how many instruments are used by the city in its offices?

Mr. GROUT. There are 200 telephone instruments in use, at $5 a year, and this gives authority to purchase, if that can be done on terms more advantageous to the District.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What about these telephone poles? Has the Government a telephone system in this city?

Mr. GROUT. Yes, sir; and a system of telegraph also.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. A system belonging to the Government?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly, to the District and the General Government. The people at large own half of it and the District owns the other half.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is it exclusively for Government use?

Mr. GROUT. It is exclusively for public use, the police, the fire department, and the different District offices.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Under what patent is it operating? The Bell telephone patents?

Mr. GROUT. I can not answer that. Not a word was said on that subject before the committee, and it was not inquired into.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Did the committee look into the question of whether it would not be cheaper to rent?

Mr. GROUT. We already rent 200 instruments, and pay but $5 a year.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then, if we rent the instruments, why should we be burdened with the expense of putting up the poles?

Mr. GROUT. The poles are for renewing the telegraph line, and the instruments are only an incident to the poles and wires when erected. If any gentleman can give us information by which any fair reduction can be made in the bill, the committee will be very glad to receive it, and will enter at once upon any reasonable course that may be necessary to carry it into effect.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the matter correctly, these lines are lines for the fire-alarm and such other service, but the District authorities rent telephones for their use the same as individuals do.

Mr. GROUT. They rent the instruments——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. They rent them the same as individuals do, and pay the telephone company as individuals do. And now, Mr. Chairman, as we have recurred to this subject, I desire to offer an amendment, to come in after the word "dollars" in line 5, page 29 of the bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any person or for any telephone company doing business in the District of Columbia to charge or receive more than $50 per annum for the use of a telephone on a separate wire; $40 for each telephone, there being not more than two on a wire; $30 for each telephone, there being not more than three on a wire, and $25 for each telephone, there being four or more on the same wire.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I must confess that possibly I do not comprehend the full scope of the proposition. However, I shall not make any point of order upon it, but will place the responsibility for its correctness upon the gentleman who offers it.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For interest and sinking fund on the funded debt, exclusive of water bonds, $1,213,947.97.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding the following, at the end of line 25, page 31: "to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. GROUT. I make a point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman state what his point of order is.

Mr. GROUT. The point of order is perfectly manifest. The amendment changes existing law. The law provides that this shall be paid as is provided in this bill, and if it is provided that it shall be paid differently the organic act is changed.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, while not assuming to know a great deal about the laws of the District, I am yet of the opinion, from the hasty and somewhat casual investigation which I have made, that the gentleman from Vermont, whose ability and information upon these subjects I fully concede, is in error in this case as to his point of order. I do not believe there is any law which requires that the United States shall pay half of this particular item of expenditure. What particular parts of the law the gentleman relies upon to sustain him in his point of order I do not know, and, not knowing, I shall call the attention of the Chair briefly to the law bearing upon this subject so far as I have been able to find it.

I do this in all sincerity, Mr. Chairman, not merely to invite the Chair to reconsider his ruling of the other day, but because, even conceding that ruling to have been correct, I think that my amendment as to this particular item is not obnoxious to the existing law or the rules of the House, and I invite the attention of the Chair and of the members of the House to this question. Of course I take it that if there be no law which requires the Government of the United States to bear half of this item of expenditure of more than $1,200,000 for a single year, then the question submitted to the House is an original question, and the amendment which I have offered ought to be adopted or rejected accordingly as gentlemen may believe that. Independently of existing law (for I think there is none on the subject), the United States ought to pay half or the District ought to pay all of this expenditure. Now, in good faith I address myself to that proposition and invite the attention of the Chairman and the House to it.

On page 23 of the Supplement to the Revised Statutes of the United States is the provision in regard to the 3.65 bonds of the District. In section 7 it is provided—

That the sinking-fund commissioners of said District are hereby continued; and it shall be the duty of said sinking-fund commissioners to cause bonds of the District of Columbia to be prepared in sums of fifty and five hundred dollars, bearing date August 1, 1874, payable fifty years after date, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, to be signed by the secretary and the treasurer of said sinking-fund commissioners and countersigned by the comptroller of said District and sealed as the board may direct.

Further on in the same section it is provided—

And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations as contemplated in this act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity.

This provision, upon examination, will be seen to lack a word or two, no doubt left out through the carelessness of the draftsman or in the printing. The same provision is repeated on page 64 of this Supplement with these words supplied. It will be found in an act entitled "An act to amend an act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874. In this latter act the clause is in this form—I will not detain the Chair by reading the whole enactment, but merely those parts which I think pertinent—

And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations as contemplated in this act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will do so, provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity.

On pages 175, 176, and so on of this same Supplement will be found the general act upon which I suppose gentlemen rely in their contention that the United States have undertaken to pay half of such expenditures as this, as well as half of other expenditures relating to the District of Columbia. The act is very long, and of course I will not detain the Chair by reading it all. But I do not believe there can be found in any part of that act authority for this contention. There is a reference to this bonded indebtedness in these words:

Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia, issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, when the same shall become due and payable; and all amounts so paid shall be credited as a part of the appropriation for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the District of Columbia, as hereinbefore provided.

On page 253 is another reference to the same subject. The provision reads:

And there is hereby appropriated, out of the proportional sum which the United States may contribute toward the expenses of the District of Columbia, in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 11, 1878, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, such sums as will, with the interest thereon at the rate of 3.65 per cent per annum, be sufficient to pay the principal of the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia issued under the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, at maturity.

On pages 947 and 948 will be found what I believe to be the latest legislation bearing directly on this subject. I call the attention of the Chair to these several provisions of law without especial reference to their bearing and without insisting that they all directly and necessarily bear on this question. My object is to lay before the Chairman as best I can the provisions of law which, so far as I know, are all the provisions necessary to be considered in determining whether the point of order raised against the amendment I have offered is or is not good.

I will now read, beginning at the bottom of page 947, from "An act approved March 31, 1891," which I repeat is, so far as I know, the latest legislation on this subject, although there may be later:

And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proportional appropriations and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will do so, provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the same at maturity.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my contention in this matter is that the United States did not by the act of 1878, providing for the payment of one-half of the expenses of this District, provide for the assumption of any part of the debt of the District or bind itself to pay any proportion of that debt whatsoever, except out of the revenues of the District. The legislation (and I have quoted from the various acts) was for the purpose of refunding these bonds and guaranteeing their payment by the United States, to the end, I have no doubt, that behind the District and the credit of the District would be thrown the credit of the United States, so that the bonds might be floated at the lowest practicable rate of interest, for the benefit of the people of the District; that the United States would provide, as it became necessary, from year to year, for the payment of the current interest and for the creation of a sinking fund to ultimately extinguish the bonds themselves; and also (I think there is no straining of the language in this, but only a fair construction) providing for the levying of such taxes within the District of Columbia as would be sufficient to raise the revenue necessary to pay the amount which the Government itself would pay. In this act of 1878, where mention is made of the payment of this interest by the Government, I do not think it is said, I do not think it is implied, that the Government would pay half of that outright, but that the Government would pay all of it and that all that it did pay should be a credit to the Government upon the amount which it was bound to pay by this half-and-half arrangement upon other items.

In other words, I think the act when fairly construed shows that the Government agreed to pay half of certain expenditures of the District of Columbia, not including the payment of the debt of the District already accrued or the interest on that debt as it came due—excluding that; and that the Government further agreed, in order to enhance the value and increase the salability of these bonds, as a matter of benefit and accommodation to the District, that it would pay not the half, but all of this interest as it accrued semiannually, and what was necessary in order to create the sinking fund, and that it would credit itself with that sum, whatever it might be, as so much paid upon the other sums which it had agreed to pay—the 50 per cent undertaking of the act.

Now, let me read this language again:

Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia, issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, when the same shall become due and payable; and all amounts so paid shall be credited as a part of the appropriations for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the District of Columbia as hereinbefore provided.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to sustain that construction let us refer again to what I believe to be the latest enactment on this subject, found on pages 947 and 948 of this volume of the statutes, and at the close of that particular act we find this language:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to provide for the payment of all expenses connected with the engraving, issuing, and redemption of the above bonds upon vouchers to be approved by the Treasurer of the United States.

I do not say, of course, that this is conclusive of the matter; but if the United States were bound by a prior arrangement, namely, in the 1878 act, to pay one-half of the expense accruing in preparing these bonds, and half of the interest on these bonds, and the one-half necessary for their extinguishment, why should there have been a provision that in getting into motion the necessary machinery for that purpose the District of Columbia should pay all of the incidental expenses, as herein provided?

The act provides further—

That the Treasurer of the United States, ex officio commissioner of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia, is hereby directed to cause to be prepared in sums of $100, $500, and $1,000, to be designated as ten-year funding bonds of the District of Columbia, bonds bearing interest—

And so on.

Now, not to unnecessarily detain the Chair, I submit that the act of 1878 did not bind the United States to pay one-half of this item of appropriation, either as to the interest or the principal of those bonds. There is no act, I claim, prior or subsequent thereto, which makes this a debt of the United States or binds the United States to pay it, except for the District of Columbia; and that the language itself, providing for this payment, thoroughly shows this. Take the pertinent paragraph of three acts—two prior to 1878 and one the act of 1891, passed on the 3d of March:

And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proportional appropriations, and by causing to be levied on the property within said District such taxes as will do so, provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the same at maturity.

Now, I submit if it were meant that the United States should pay one-half and that the District of Columbia should pay the other half, this language is most unhappily chosen and must be distorted and perverted to give it that meaning. But if the meaning is that the United States shall pay, as I understand, and shall cause to be levied on the property of the District the taxes necessary to provide the sum to pay—"such taxes as will do so"—as the act says, then we have clearness and reason out of what would otherwise be confusion and uncertainty.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why should the United States assume that debt? Why should this act, unless it is clearly so in terms—this act of 1878—be held to be retroactive in its effect? We all know, as a matter of current history, that prior to that period the District of Columbia had its own government, legislated for itself, regulated its own expenditures, had its own officers, made its own laws, subject, of course, to the supervision and jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States. The District of Columbia created the indebtedness at that time. Why should the United States, then, assume that indebtedness, and why do we assume that the United States have assumed such indebtedness, unless it be clearly so expressed in the act itself? It would seem that when there was a change in the system, or in the policy adopted toward the District of Columbia, it may be reasonably assumed that the lawmakers would contemplate only that in the future a division of expenditure should be made, without any reference to the existing burdens of the District, accumulated in the past.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the burden is on him who claims that the Government of the United States assumed this indebtedness to clearly show a law or agreement which binds the United States in that respect. It is not so set forth in clearly expressed language in any of the acts to which I have referred—not even by fair implication; and I submit that the several provisions of the law which I have read are not to be reconciled upon common reason and according to the force of language with such a construction. It is clear enough upon the face of the acts themselves that the Government of the United States simply set itself up as a guarantor of the bonds, gave its promises that the bonds should be liquidated out of the revenues of the District.

The United States gave to the District a guaranty that they would float the bonds and gave the purchasers of the bonds assurance that the Government would see that they were paid; and the United States have nothing more to do with them than to comply with that agreement, raising the necessary funds by District taxation. The act itself specifies how the bonds are to be paid; not one-half out of the revenues of the Government and one-half by the District of Columbia, but by revenues to be derived by taxes upon property in the District of Columbia. In the language of the act itself, the Government, in order to pay, will "levy upon the property in such District such taxes as will do so." That is, will pay the interest and indebtedness, not one-half, but all of it, out of District revenues.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the date of the act to which the gentleman is now referring?

Mr. DE ARMOND. The date of this act that I am now quoting from is March 3, 1891; and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is, as far as I can find, the same provision in substance and essence as that which was contained in the act of 1874.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the significance of the words "by proportional appropriation"?

Mr. DE ARMOND. The meaning that I give to that, Mr. Chairman, is this: By such appropriations, from time to time, as shall be necessary to meet these accruing obligations. One year it would be so much and another year it would be less, or more. There is also a provision in these laws for taking in bonds. It would depend, too, upon the amount set aside at any time for the sinking fund. That is the meaning that I give to that phrase. I submit that it is a reasonable construction of it, or meaning for it, and that it is more in harmony with the language of the statute, and I think the purposes of these statutes, than any other.

Now, Mr. Chairman, not to detain the House or the Chairman longer, I wish this matter could be passed over without prejudice, especially if the bill is not to be concluded to-day. Then you, Mr. Chairman, could examine these various provisions, and other gentlemen interested in the matter might look into it, so that the question might be decided upon investigation, which, it seems to me, would be a good thing. I am not captious about it; but I assume that, like members in general, the Chairman has not sufficiently looked into this matter so as to be fully informed upon it. I do not know that he has not. If he has specially examined the law, then of course there is no reason for postponement so far as he is concerned. Delay and a careful investigation, however, will, I believe, lead to the conclusion that the amendment is not out of order on account of the United States being bound by existing law to pay half of this item of expenditure, whatever it may be, for I believe there is no such law. No harm can come by investigation, it seems to me. I merely suggest this. Of course I have no right to ask it and do not ask it.

Mr. GROUT. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] that it is the hope of the committee to pass this bill to-day. Now, it seems to me the Chairman caught the vulnerable point in the gentleman's argument when he asked him what he understood by the expression that the faith of Congress was pledged to make proportional appropriations for payment of the debt. I do not know but the gentleman answered to the satisfaction of the Chair, but he did not answer to my satisfaction, although I will admit that my attention for the moment was somewhat diverted.

Why is Congress by these continued acts plighting its faith and agreeing, by proportional appropriations, to see these bonds or this debt paid, if it is only a guarantor. It seems to me that is strange language for a simple guarantor. What little knowledge I have of law would enable me to place it in the other category, and that is, when they talk about a proportional appropriation, I should understand it as the language itself plainly implies, that Congress thereby agrees to appropriate its share, its proportion, whatever it may be.

It is true the acts the gentleman read from do not define it, but the acts of 1874 and 1878 very clearly define that proportion as being one-half. There is that also in appropriation acts ever since those acts that make it plainer still, and that is the fact that the interest and sinking fund have been appropriated for annually and in the very language employed in this bill. But, as settling this matter beyond all question, there is a permanent appropriation on this subject in the sundry civil act of 1880, and it is in this language:

And there is hereby appropriated, out of the proportional sum which the United States may contribute toward the expenses of the District of Columbia in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 11, 1878, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, such sums as will, with the interest thereon at the rate of 3.65 per cent per annum, be sufficient to pay the principal of the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia issued under the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, at maturity; which said sums the Secretary of the Treasury shall annually invest in said bonds at not exceeding the par value thereof; and all bonds so redeemed shall cease to bear interest and shall be cancelled and destroyed in the same manner that United States bonds are canceled and destroyed.

It seems to me that this permanent appropriation must be accepted as a definite settlement of this question by express declaration of Congress; and in compliance with this permanent appropriation the District bill has annually carried this appropriation, in order to have the current appropriations show the current liabilities of the Government. Just about one-half of $1,213,000 is for the interest on the public debt, and the other half goes to the sinking fund.

Let me ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] if it does not seem strange to him, providing his view be correct, that this has not been discovered till now? I commend to the gentleman's careful consideration the act of 1880, which is a permanent appropriation.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Vermont if he will consent to let this pass over until the other provisions of the bill have been disposed of to-day, so as to give the Chair and members an opportunity to look into it. I do not mean to pass it over to-day, but until a later part of the day.

Mr. GROUT. This proposition has been sprung upon us without a moment's notice, but we do not ask any delay. I wish to say to the gentleman that he has presented in a very able and complete manner his argument, and as a special pleader I think it does him great credit. I can hardly see how he, who has evidently taken much time to carefully investigate this question, should ask for further time now. We are willing to submit it to the decision of the Chair now.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire for myself that it be laid over. I am not going to waste time in insisting upon it. I merely suggested it, and the only reason for the suggestion is that the Chairman, if he chooses to do so, could look further into it, and that other members of the House should have opportunity to look into it if they see proper.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, at the suggestion of several gentlemen about me, it seems to me that it is a very important question to determine whether the Government of the United States assumed all the District of Columbia debt and are obligated to appropriate $1,200,000 a year to meet a provision of the obligation assumed by the District for 3.65 bonds.

I am told by a gentleman near me that he has examined the Revised Statutes this morning, and that he is entirely satisfied that at least it is very doubtful whether the Government of the United States ever assumed any part of that old debt—that the mischief that they did assume looked to the future; and it being a question of such importance as it is, the gentleman having the bill in charge might let this matter go over until Monday, so that it could be examined.

Mr. GROUT. We are going to pass this bill this afternoon if we have good luck.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman may not have such good luck as he predicts if he starts out on that policy.

Mr. GROUT. How is that?

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman may not have such good luck if he starts out on that line.

Mr. GROUT. Oh, I understand; the gentleman can filibuster and prevent the passage of the bill, but I hope he will not.

Mr. POWERS. Well, Mr. Chairman, if we can save the United States Government $1,200,000 a year we had better filibuster.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, it is not $1,200,000. That is the amount provided in this bill for next year. The debt of the District amounts to over $20,000,000.

Mr. POWERS. I read the language of the gentleman's bill:

For interest and sinking fund on the funded debt, exclusive of water bonds, $1,213,947.97.

Mr. GROUT. That is just for this year.

Mr. POWERS. That is exactly what we are talking about.

Mr. GROUT. Yes; but the liability of the United States is for the debt the District owed at the time it went into partnership with the District, and the debt at the time we formed the copartnership with the District amounted to $20,000,000. That is the question that is involved; and if it were an open question, if anybody could fairly be in doubt about it, I would not hesitate——

Mr. SAYERS. I suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that this provision be passed over until the rest of the bill shall have been completed.

Mr. GROUT. Well, I will not object, but it seems to me that the party who made the assault ought not to ask quarter so soon.

Mr. POWERS. I am not making any assault upon it.

Mr. GROUT. I am not referring to my colleague; I am referring to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. POWERS. This is a very important matter, and my colleague has made it altogether more important than I had thought, for he says it involves an obligation to pay $20,000,000, which doubtless further involves the present obligation to pay $1,200,000. Now, that is an important matter that should not be rushed through the committee without giving the members of the committee and the Chair ample opportunity to look the question up—if we are bound to pay this money, and if there is any doubt, then the good sense of the committee would dictate that we take time to examine the question.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would suggest to my friend in charge of the bill that this item be passed over until we shall have completed the remainder of the bill, and during that time doubtless some arrangement can be made in respect to this item.

Mr. GROUT. I am willing to give these gentlemen further opportunity to study this problem, which seems to them a very complex one, and I ask unanimous consent that the item be passed over until we complete the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the pending amendment, with the point of order pending, be passed over until the close of the bill. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers and Sailors, Grand Army of the Republic, $2,500.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out this paragraph, and in that connection I ask the attention of the committee for a few minutes. The proposition which I make here brings us face to face with a vital question which is involved in this matter of charitable appropriations. I have made a motion to strike out the paragraph which has just been read not because I believe the purpose of that appropriation is not meritorious. I represent a district, sir, upon every quarter section of which there resides an ex-Union soldier. I certainly am not wanting in loyalty to that band of gallant men, some of whom may be so unfortunate as to stray within the confines of this District. But, Mr. Chairman, there is another great question involved here. We seek to appropriate under this subhead $219,925. Of this amount there is appropriated for exclusively private purposes $81,700 and $138,225 for public purposes. The items of private appropriation which are included in this general subject, and which make a total of $81,700, are the following:

For Temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers	$2,500
For Woman's Christian Association	4,000
For Central Dispensary and Emergency Hospital	15,000
For Children's Hospital	10,000
For National Homeopathic Hospital Association	8,500
For Washington Hospital for Foundlings	6,000
For Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish	1,800
For German Orphan Asylum	1,800
For National Association for Destitute Colored Women and Children	9,900
For St. Ann's Infant Asylum	5,400
For Association for Works of Mercy	1,800
For House of Good Shepherd	2,700
For St. Rose Industrial School	4,500
For St. Joseph Asylum	1,800
For Young Women's Christian Home	1,000
For Home and Help Mission	1,000
For Newsboy and Children's Aid Society	1,000
For Eastern Dispensary	1,000
For Washington Home for Incurables	2,000

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that several of the paragraphs appropriating for the institutions which the gentleman has enumerated have not yet been read.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I read these paragraphs as a part of my remarks. If the gentleman from Alabama will contain himself he will probably obtain some information which he has not now.

Mr. WHEELER. I shall be very glad of that.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. These private appropriations make an aggregate of $81,700.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I make no question but that each of these institutions for which an appropriation is here sought to be made is doing a meritorious work. Some of them are sectarian and others are unsectarian, but each one of those to which I have called attention is a purely private institution. Their work, while philanthropic, is in the real sense private; they represent no public work. Let this committee understand it, these are institutions over which the Government has absolutely no control. These institutions, it is true, make reports to the superintendent of charities, but those reports are not made under oath. The Government of the United States, which makes these appropriations, has no right to say what persons shall enter any of these institutions or what persons shall go out of them.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Neither can the Government examine their records.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No; the Government can not examine their records. It can not and does not specify the purpose for which a single dollar of the money that is here appropriated shall be expended. It can not and does not require an itemized report of their expenditures. It is true, as I have said, that reports are made by these institutions to the superintendent of charities, but those reports are not made under oath, nor are they verified in any particular. No officer of the Government has a right to go into these institutions and verify or check up their expenditures. No officer of the Government can call upon them for a statement of all their receipts. The Government can not call upon them for a clear, concise statement of all the moneys which come into their hands. It exercises no control over them. The public whose money is appropriated has but the merest general knowledge derived from perfunctory reports of the work they really do. Neither the Government nor the public has access to make investigation, correct abuses, if any exist, or institute needed reforms. The Government has but one function respecting any of them and that is to pay the bill. The credit is monopolized by the church or institute. The blame is buried with the unfortunates. Many of these institutions are self-sustaining. Let me call attention to some of them. Take, for instance, the Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish. The report of that institution appears on pages 207–210 of the report for the year 1895, made by the superintendent of charities. On the pages I have indicated it appears that this institution receives a large amount of money. It is an institution founded——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the gentleman from Nebraska will be allowed additional time.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed without limit.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I thank the committee for its indulgence and I will endeavor not to abuse it.

On page 207 of the report to which I have referred will be found a statement of certain receipts by this institution. Its receipts from April 11, 1894, to March 5, 1895, it appears, were sufficient to enable it to pay on notes to one Bettes $1,027, and to Riggs & Co. on orphanage debt $5,000, making a total of $6,027 applied on indebtedness after paying all current indebtedness. On page 210 of the same report I find it stated this institution has property in this city and "at its country home in Virginia valued at about $50,000, which was secured from private sources, with the exception of $10,000 public money invested in improvements." It appears to be investing in, or at least holding, property as an investment, and continues to ask Government aid.

On the face of that statement it would appear that the total receipts of this institution were something over $10,000 for the time mentioned, but by referring to the succeeding page we discover that certain donations have been received which are not included in that statement, and you find on examination that not one dollar received from "donations" has been carried into this account. The real amount of money received by this institution, splendid though its work may be, does not appear. This is an institution attached to one of the wealthiest churches in this city. Among its patrons are numbered ladies who are recognized as millionaires. Among them are Mrs. Leland Stanford and Mrs. George T. Hearst. Again I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I make no question as to the value of the work of this institution, but I am pointing out the private character of this and all the institutions I have spoken of, and I ask this question: If you are to make appropriation here for this private institution, located in the city of Washington, and having for its patrons the millionaires of California and of other parts of the country, why, in the name of common sense, should you not with equal propriety make appropriations for worthy private institutions in the district in which I live, located in my town or in my State?

Go further through the list of these institutions and you find that some, in addition to being private, are sectarian. Basing my objection as I do on higher and more comprehensive ground, I make no question now upon that point. There are, it is true, a large number of people in this country who do make a question on that. There are many who recognize the fact that one of the foundation principles on which this Government is based is that there shall be an absolute divorce of church and state. You can not have this absolute divorce and at the same time appropriate money to sectarian institutions for purely sectarian purposes.

As I said, however, I do not now make point on that. It may not be seemly for me to object to any of these institutions because of their sectarian character. Certainly I would not assail one of them for the sole reason it belongs to the Catholic Church. I make no secret, gentlemen, of the fact I was born on a foreign shore and born of parents who belonged to the Catholic Church. In that church I was baptized. I am not a member, however, of that church or any other. But I revere the grand good work which that church has done. I recognize the fact that the splendid charitable institutions all over the world, founded and conducted by the Catholic Church and under its sheltering folds, have been doing and are doing to-day most noble work. But I want to say to the members of this House and the country that the good work they do does not depend upon appropriations coming from any Government. The appropriations upon which they depend come from people whose hearts go out to the poor, the sick, and the unfortunate in all this world. So it is with these other institutions. Take the Temporary Soldiers' Home. If the unfortunate soldiers must rely simply upon this pittance of $2,500, then they would better go to the potter's field at once. No; they will be cared for just as well without this appropriation as with it—aye, better. The patriotism of this nation will provide for them homes and shelters, sustenance and asylums, but it will do it directly and not secondhand.

Let it be known that we are contending here for a principle—a principle which must abide. We say that the Government should appropriate money only for public purposes; there should be absolutely no appropriation for private purposes of any character or description. I care not how meritorious they be, not one dollar should be appropriated for them. How many of you gentlemen here would willingly vote for the support of a Methodist college, a Catholic college, a Presbyterian college? Yet education is necessary to the maintenance of popular government; there is no question about that. But not one of us would so vote. And yet that question is a much closer one than that we are considering, for we all admit that it is the province of the Government to educate its children; we know that such is its duty, and we appropriate liberally for it. But we appropriate for governmental institutions. We make the public schools of our country one of the charges of our government—municipal, State, and national. And so it should be with these charitable institutions in this District. There is need for them, God knows. We need to appropriate more money for these laudable purposes. We should take care of all the sick and unfortunate of whom the public may properly take care. But we should fairly and squarely meet this question. We should establish public institutions, public asylums, public homes, public reformatories for the purpose of taking care of these unfortunates.

No gentleman can give one good, valid reason for appropriating public money for private purposes. Certainly no Democrat can favor such an appropriation. Members of that party have made their contention from time out of mind that the tariff policy of the Republican party is wrong, and why? Because, as they say, it lays burdens upon the people at large for the benefit of the few. If their contention were right, I should vote against any protective tariff. If their contention is right, then our system of tariff can not be defended. But we do defend that system by denying their premises. And so both Republicans and Democrats join in the principle that there should be no taxation for private purposes. Every dollar of this money comes from some form of taxation or tribute which the Government levies. The money expended is public funds. I base my opposition upon the broad principle, the broad ground, that no matter what church asks it, no matter what private institution asks it, I care not how meritorious may be its work, you have no right to vote one dollar for that purpose. And I shall make a motion to strike out, not only this paragraph which has been read, but every other of similar purport. Then I shall move that all the children that may properly be transferred to the board of children's guardians shall be remitted to their care. By doing this we plant ourselves upon a solid foundation.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion allow me to say that I make these motions not without great reluctance. I realize that there is much of loyalty due from me to the committee which I have been honored with membership upon. I know that by reporting them they seem to favor these items I am assailing. I know, too, that the good work which is done by these several institutions makes an appeal to us very hard to resist. Nor would I, Mr. Chairman, make this motion if I believed that any truly worthy destitute unfortunate person, young or old, would fail of proper care in the absence of these appropriations. But proper care will be furnished to all these people in distress.

The session is yet young. Only yesterday, when an attempt was made in this committee to relieve the people from the monopolistic outrages which the community have been suffering so many years—when that attempt was made we were routed by a sortie under the gallant leadership of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], whom I much admire, and we were prevented from effecting any such purpose by the interposition of a point of order. We were then given assurances that at an early day the proper committee would bring in general legislation bearing upon the subject. And we were treated to the dazzling prospect of a utilization of certain rapids 20 miles up the river, which would do away with all monopoly. If that argument was good, if it could obtain here at that time, I ask you now, why may not the Committee on the District of Columbia, whose able chairman is eager and ready, whose feet are swift in all good works—I ask you why may they not bring in a general bill which will take care of all these charities that we can not take care of under this appropriation bill by the institution of a rational public system of charities founded on right principle and violation of no principle of our Government? So, then, I say, from whatever standpoint we look at this matter, if we adopt the principle for which I contend, we are safe because we are right.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] who has just taken his seat speaks with a great deal of eloquence of the importance of these charities and their great needs, and, as he admits, their commendable merits. The charitable institution which he particularly attacks appeared to have been the orphan asylum connected with St. John's Church, and his charge is that two ladies, Mrs. Leland Stanford and Mrs. George Hearst, have contributed largely to its support, or, to use his language, have become its patronesses. Now, because two very excellent and charitable Christian ladies aid this worthy institution from their private means is the gentleman's ground of attack.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Pardon me; I made no attack upon any institution.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman did not attack the institution, but his attack was upon the small appropriation of $1,800 which has been recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, and he opposes this meager appropriation, giving as a reason that the two ladies we have mentioned are patronesses of this asylum for orphans.

Now, the appropriation of $1,800 is only 3 cents per capita per day for each inmate of that asylum.

If the gentleman had studied the origin of the charitable institutions in this city I am confident that he would never have made that speech.

As far back as thirty-five years ago most of these institutions were inaugurated. They were built up and supported almost entirely by the charitable and Christian people of the District of Columbia by their own means.

St. Paul tells us:

> And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.

There is probably no city in the world of the population of Washington where there has been so great an amount of money dispensed in charity as has been done in this city. The very nature of the government of this city seemed to make it necessary years ago for Christian people to take up this subject and establish institutions to care for the sick and needy. Years before the war, the great philanthropist, Mr. Corcoran, commenced devoting a large portion of his means to charity, and his gifts before his death were, by his dying bequest, perpetuated for all time. The late Mr. Riggs was also munificent in his donations, and the same spirit of liberality has been maintained by his family since the day of his death.

In the last twenty-five years the roll of the citizens of Washington who have devoted their time and means to relieving distress among the poor and providing for orphans has largely increased. I could mention many of these names, but they are well known among the people.

One institution that the gentleman referred to, the House of the Good Shepherd, was established by the efforts and means of the daughter of an eminent naval officer, Miss Annie E. Smith, who died recently, and who devoted all of her fortune and much of her life to the establishment of that charitable association. Here ladies, who receive no compensation, devote their lives to protecting the innocent and lifting up the fallen. The House of the Good Shepherd is without revenue, under debt for a balance still due on its building, and is trying to become self-supporting by taking in plain sewing.

Now, the gentleman also spoke of St. Joseph's Asylum. The report of the superintendent of charities shows that many of the children between 6 and 14 years of age in that institution are the children of disabled United States soldiers. They have been cared for without any recompense during the time when they were so small and helpless. The only source of their support is the bequests of the generous.

During the war the charitable institutions of this city gladly gave homes to a great number of wounded and disabled soldiers and the children of soldiers wounded or killed in battle. This patriotic and commendable action on their part of course impressed Congress, and with great propriety they contributed a small sum to these institutions to help defray expenses which by no means properly devolved upon local charitable associations.

An effort was made in the last Congress to deprive the institutions of these meager appropriations, and the Committee on Appropriations was induced by ex parte statements to remit all these institutions to the board of children's guardians, giving to that body a sum in bulk equal to that which had been distributed among the various charitable associations; but after the bill was reported, the impolicy and injustice of the measure was made so apparent that the entire committee gladly acquiesced in an amendment which was offered upon the floor of the House which restored the greater part, distributing it as had been done in previous years and in about the same proportion as is provided for in this bill, and that amendment passed the House and Senate, as I remember, by an absolutely unanimous vote.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman will permit me, I want the committee to understand that the Appropriations Committee did not strike any of these in the last bill.

Mr. WHEELER. No; two years ago was the bill to which I referred, and the bill as now framed gives to these associations 60 per cent of their former appropriations—the same amount that the House and Senate deemed it their duty to give in that bill, which passed the House and Senate, as I remember, without a dissenting vote. The gentleman spoke of the different religious associations which were connected with these institutions, and referred to their religious features as a reason for opposing the appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, it makes no difference to me whether a man who worships the God of Heaven kneels in one church or another. It makes no difference to me whether the good people of this land who religiously devote their time and means to charitable purposes worship in one church or another; and most of them, God bless them, are the good women; and it is from them that comes nearly all the good there is in this world. They are all obeying the mandate of the sermon on the mount. All denominations are doing good, charitable work in the District of Columbia, and it is our duty to give them aid to the small extent that the bill proposes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. To support them.

Mr. WHEELER. No, sir; not to support them; the Government does not support them; it gives but a very small percentage for the support of these institutions. Many of these institutions have been inaugurated at the cost of from ten to thirty-five thousand dollars, all contributed by the charitable people of the District, and these same good people contribute annually from $3,000 to $10,000 to each of these associations; and the gentleman objects to the small pittance which this bill proposes to add to the fund, and which enables them to care for and support the waifs and orphans who are brought here from all other parts of the country, and who would be a charge upon the different States were it not that these people here are active in their charity and come to the aid of these unfortunates.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want my friend from Alabama to answer this question, if he will.

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Are you in favor of the United States Government supporting or aiding any one sectarian or religious denomination in any of its enterprises?

Mr. WHEELER. I am very sorry that the gentleman has, upon the floor of the House, asked such a question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I mean, to furnish them aid to carry on sectarian institutions.

Mr. WHEELER. I repeat that I am sorry to hear a gentleman stand in this Hall and bring in a question of difference of religious opinion when we are considering a cause of charity. [Applause.] The bill is not to aid any one sect or religious denomination. It proposes to aid the poor, needy, and infirm, and the helpless orphans, without any question as to their sectarian or religious denomination.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask for permission to continue for just three minutes longer.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman will answer my question, I will make the request that his time be extended.

Mr. CANNON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like to get on with the bill, and will speak to the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska for a few moments.

Mr. WHEELER. I trust, then, if I can not have my time extended, that the House will vote against the amendment. For the sake of Christian charity, I say, in God's name, do not trample down the charitable efforts of the good people of the city, but aid them in this most commendable work, which they are so successfully prosecuting.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama be extended five minutes. The House has just extended that courtesy to the gentleman who made the motion [Mr. HAINER of Nebraska].

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Alabama can come in subsequently.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will not object, although we ought to proceed with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes longer.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the gentlemen from Tennessee and the House. I think I answered Mr. LIVINGSTON'S question, and I fully concur with him that Congress should not make any distinction between any sects or religious denominations, and this bill is most notably exempt from any such feature. Congress bears the same relation to the District of Columbia that a legislature does to a State, and it is an imperative duty of Congress to make provision for the indigent, the sick, the infirm, the disabled, and the orphans which come under its care; and if the gentleman will examine this bill he will see that all institutions have been so justly provided for that a claim has never been made that any sect or denomination has been discriminated against. I see here institutions provided for which are under the control of Lutherans, Episcopalians, Catholics, and united denominations, which, I believe, include all religious persuasions.

It was admitted in this House two years ago that this board of children's guardians have rules and regulations which are so at variance with the rules and regulations of these institutions that it is impossible for their beneficiaries to be cared for by the board, and I understand the purpose of the gentleman is to remit all of the appropriations for these various associations to the board of guardians. While it will not reduce the expenditure a particle, it will simply change the direction of the appropriation and turn it into another channel, which the superintendent of charities says is not properly organized to administer it. The superintendent in his report begs Congress not to place these matters under his control, for if under the board of children's guardians it would be virtually under his supervision; but he asks that they be left to the institutions, because his experience during three years shows that the greatest good can not come from the fund if it is turned over to the board of guardians, and that the best good can only be attained by leaving it under the organizations which now have it in charge.

In a former report of Colonel Tracey, superintendent of charities of the District of Columbia, he shows how fully he appreciates the great work done by the people of the city, and his investigations show how the charitable institutions have depended almost entirely on the generosity of the people and not upon appropriations from Congress. He says:

It is deemed proper, in concluding this report, to refer to an erroneous impression regarding the charitable institutions of the District which prevails quite widely among those not familiar with them, as I know from experience before and since my official connection with the charities of Washington. This impression is that these institutions are unduly dependent upon Government aid, and that in fact some of them have been founded and are maintained rather with a view to securing to them participation in the United States Treasury appropriations than for the sake of the good they can accomplish. This belief is utterly baseless.

Colonel Tracey also tells us that besides these institutions which receive a small moiety of their incomes from the Government there are other charitable institutions which accomplish great good, and which are supported entirely by the benevolence of men and women of this city. These institutions, as stated by him, are conspicuous monuments to the goodness, benevolence, and charity of Christian people who devote their time, efforts, and means to these institutions of mercy. He says:

Not only are the unofficial charitable institutions of the District of Columbia maintained, as they were founded, by private benefaction in far greater degree than by public appropriation, but there are in Washington and its vicinity a number of admirable institutions which have never been, to any extent whatever, a public charge and do not now receive Government aid. As examples of such establishments founded and conducted by widely varying philanthropic influences, I mention three, the Home for Incurables, the Society of the Little Sisters of the Poor, and the Washington City Protestant Orphan Asylum. They support helpless persons who would otherwise necessarily be public charges, and, to the extent of their benefactions, thereby relieve the public funds. The Home for Incurables is the most perfect institution of its class of which I have knowledge. It is a conspicuous monument to the benevolence of philanthropic men and women of Washington and a striking illustration of the fact that for practical munificence and volunteer charitable effort the city which is the seat of our Federal Government is second to none in proportion to its population and resources.

Colonel Tracey's report, which has just been published, shows the commendable economy with which the money appropriated by the Government has been used. The following table shows the amount proposed to be appropriated and the average number of inmates during the past year:

Institutions.	Proposed appropriation.	Average number of inmates.
Woman's Christian Association	$4,000	91
Washington Hospital for Foundlings	6,000	34
Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish	1,800	95
German Orphan Asylum	1,800	39
St. Ann's Infant Asylum	5,400	130
Association for Works of Mercy	1,800	26
House of the Good Shepherd	2,700	91
St. Rose's Industrial School	4,500	65
St. Joseph's Asylum	1,800	100
Young Women's Christian Home	1,000	328
Total	30,800	999

Annual cost to the Government per capita, $31.03.
Daily cost to the Government per capita, 8 cents.

Let us contrast this small expenditure per capita with the expense to the Government of maintaining, without private assistance, the Reform School, the Girls' Reform School, and the Washington Asylum:

Institutions.	Appropriation.	Average number of inmates.
The Reform School	$41,902	201
The Girls' Reform School	9,425	60
The Washington Asylum	62,415	522
Total	113,742	783

Annual cost to the Government per capita, $145.26.
Daily cost to the Government per capita, 26 cents.

Should this amount of appropriation per capita be given to the inmates of institutions cared for in great part by private benevolence the

Cost to the Government would be $145,114.74
Instead of 30,800.00

A cost of 114,314.74

more than is necessary under the present system. Or, if the inmates of these institutions were placed under the board of guardians, as suggested by the gentleman, the

Cost to the Government would be $157,112.73
Instead of 30,000.00

An increased expense of 127,112.73

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain the House, and I will therefore again beg the House with unanimous voice to vote the amendment down.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. I desire to address myself to this clause in the bill, and to this motion:

For Temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers and Sailors, Grand Army of the Republic, $2,500.

Appropriations similar to this have been made annually since 1889. The Grand Army of the Republic at Washington and the Woman's Relief Corps have been incorporated under the title expressed in the item. Now, let us see why. I hold in my hand the report from this corporation, from which I will read a few words:

Those of you who are familiar with the relief work of this department know that the question of relief has been and is now one of great anxiety and responsibility, and as the years roll around the work increases in magnitude. The object of our temporary home is to care for our comrades who come here temporarily, and who have no place to stop and nothing financially to keep them during the few days they may desire to remain. Some come here to see about their pension claims, bounty, or back pay. Many come to try to gain admittance to the different national or State homes. Washington is their Mecca. From the year 1885 to July, 1889, the following statement was made—

And so forth. Now, last fiscal year the admissions were 1,036. The meals served were 18,000 and the lodgings furnished were 8,364. The expenditures were $2,516.76. The report then goes on to show all the donations that were made by comrades here in the District to this corporation and the gratuitous service of the good women who belong to the Relief Corps who help carry on this work as well as the brethren in the Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. LIVINGSTON rose.

Mr. CANNON. I can not yield for a moment. I have only hinted at the necessity for this home. The report further goes on to show that as the years roll by the necessity for this work will disappear, as these men are fast passing from earth.

Now, this is a private corporation, organized to do public work, to relieve suffering humanity. It is carried on economically, in part by private contribution, eked out by this small appropriation, and although it is a private corporation, the work, which is of a public nature, is done for a mere tithe of what it could be done for if the United States were to build a home for this temporary purpose, own it, officer it, and pay all its expenses from the public Treasury; and instead of doing this work for a fraction over $2,400, it would be multiplied ten, twenty, thirty, forty fold in expense, and probably would be be no better done.

As practical people, mindful of our surroundings, we should avail ourselves of the voluntary help of these comrades and of the good women who extend this relief, and we should make this small appropriation.

I will grant, in reply to the gentleman from Nebraska, that much can be said about "the sovereign," "the Government," expending public appropriations only through public institutions. That proposition might be well if you had the system to do it. But human suffering does not wait; to build your hospitals it does not wait; to build your homes it does not wait. It comes all the time, and we have human suffering here, and through the years this work has grown up and is being well done, and, in my judgment, from a practical, a patriotic, and an economic standpoint, can be best served by appropriating this money.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman pardon me, just one moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROUT. I ask that the gentleman have time.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I have said all I want to. I am opposed to striking out this provision; and as we want to get this bill through to-night, I hope that we will take up one motion after another and dispose of each motion upon its merits.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not doubt the anxiety of the distinguished chairman of the committee to get this bill through——

Mr. CANNON. I have no desire to cut off my friend.

Mr. GROSVENOR (continuing). And for that reason during these two or three days' debate I have not occupied one moment of the time of the House, but the speech of the gentleman from Nebraska has impressed me materially, and I may say almost produced a profound impression upon me, and in looking into these items of the appropriation bill I am frank to say that I do not like the looks of them, and that, however much regard for the system that has grown up, it is, if not in direct terms a violation of the Constitution, an evasion, and a direct evasion, of the spirit of the Constitution. It does not, I take it, make any difference whether the appropriation is made directly for the support of religion or a sectarian institution or whether it is made in such a way that the practical benefit of it shall be to build up a sectarian institution.

Now, I am the last member of this House, in my judgment, who would hesitate to vote money for a charitable purpose. I have managed through all my life to keep myself poor by practical demonstration of my spirit in that direction, and I expect to die in the same condition; but I know there is a feeling growing up in the country that is entitled to great respect, and a feeling we can not deny to be in all respects American. I care nothing about any man's religion so he has a little religion in practice. I have not enough of my own to justify me in making war upon anyone else. I draw no line upon creeds, nor upon declarations of theology; but I can not understand, and I can not consent to the propriety of an appropriation of money to an institution that must necessarily be, in my judgment, indirectly, at least, a religious organization, and which is to be used for sectarian ends and purposes.

I do not go to the whole extent of the gentleman from Nebraska, but we all understand we have passed beyond the time when, either without any consistency or without proper consistency, we can say that we will not use public money through the instrumentality of private hands for these charitable purposes. We give a large amount of money every year to the State Soldiers' Homes. They are, so far as we are concerned, private corporations, and yet we confer large donations of money upon them; for what purpose? So that we may aid in the care and support of indigent soldiers by indirect means, because in our judgment, legislative judgment, it is more economical and wiser to convey that charity through an organized channel than it would be to administer it upon any other system. So we can not say that we may not employ private corporations, if you please, or private associations or organizations, to take care of beneficiaries which otherwise we would feel called upon to make direct appropriations for the support of, but what I do not like, and what I wish we had a little further information from the committee on, is as to the necessity for these appropriations to which attention will be called, and which look so much to the public—possibly not to the committee, possibly not to this committee, but at all events to the public—as they see it as a use of public money for religious uses, and, more, in the system that has been so sharply criticised, and which you will hear a great deal more about in the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill—by which, practically, church organization has been benefited by the appropriation of money disbursed for the real purposes of government, and which practically has been diverted into other channels.

I will not support the pending motion, but I call attention to the principle I have referred to.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I, too, have been profoundly impressed by the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska. I do not rise at the present time for the purpose of discussing these appropriations.

I do, however, think that this committee is entitled to some explanation in detail of this long list of charities for which it is proposed to appropriate so much public money. I desire to vote intelligently upon the subject, and before I can do so I think that, as a member of this committee, I am entitled, in spite of the passing time and the urgency of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, to an explanation in detail of each one of these charities. If they are, as has been alleged by the gentleman from Nebraska, purely private institutions, entirely withdrawn from public supervision and control, I for one am unable conscientiously to vote for these appropriations, no matter what the purposes may be that they are intended to serve. I renew again to the committee which has charge of this bill the request that this Committee of the Whole receive a full explanation in detail of each one of these challenged appropriations for charities.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I read from the report made to the proper authorities touching the paragraph before the House. The motion is to strike out that paragraph, and, as the bill is read paragraph by paragraph, if any further motion is to be made to strike out any other items it can be made and discussed when the proper time comes. Action now is to be upon the paragraph that has been read. I have explained it; the reports have been referred to, and I suppose we are ready to vote.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman please tell us what is the pending paragraph?

Mr. CANNON. I will read it again: "For Temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers and Sailors, Grand Army of the Republic, $2,500."

The motion now is to strike out that paragraph, and, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not think anyone desires to strike that paragraph out or to have any discussion about it.

Mr. MOODY. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if the government of the District of Columbia has any supervision or control over this "Temporary Home"?

Mr. CANNON. None beyond the fact that the institution taking this appropriation is required to report to the superintendent of charities, who reports to the District, and I hold in my hand the report of the District Commissioners, which is to be found in the document room. This is a private corporation, composed of humane and patriotic people who desire to relieve persons who need relief, as I explained a while ago, and for one I am ready to vote on the motion to strike out.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is not the charity which receives this contribution from the Treasury of the United States confined to members of the Grand Army of the Republic?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Read the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will read the paragraph for the third time. [Mr. CANNON here read the paragraph again.] Now, I will inform the gentleman that "Temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers and Sailors, Grand Army of the Republic," is the name of the corporation to which this appropriation is made.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir; "Temporary Home for Union Soldiers" is the name of the institution. Now, I want to ask the gentleman one more question.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman again by saying that "Temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers and Sailors, Grand Army of the Republic," is the name of the corporation which receives this appropriation of $2,500, and here is the report showing how the money is expended.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Are any but ex-Union soldiers taken into that institution and cared for over night?

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, no. The institution is for that specific purpose. We appropriate elsewhere——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. For what?

Mr. CANNON. For other charities.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then this is not only a private corporation, but it is an exclusive corporation.

Mr. CANNON. It is exclusive to the extent that I have stated. If the gentleman does not approve of it, let him vote to strike out this appropriation.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. I understood the gentleman to say in his former remarks that there was a large amount of donations given to this institution, by which it profited.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; work is donated, provisions are donated, and other things are donated.

Mr. HENRY of Indiana. Does not the gentleman's own statement show that only the amount appropriated was used by the institution?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, not at all.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, the point has been made that only ex-Union soldiers who are members of the Grand Army of the Republic are admitted to this institution.

Mr. CANNON. Well, that is a mistake.

Mr. MILES. That is what I wanted the House to know.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. That is not true.

Mr. MILES. I know it is not true.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Conceding that this Temporary Home does excellent work, as I have every reason to believe it does, can the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] distinguish in principle between this appropriation and an appropriation for any of these other private institutions—for St. Ann's Asylum, for instance?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that this appropriation, if made, will go to this special corporation for the purpose indicated in the bill and will be so used.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I concede that.

Mr. CANNON. I will answer the gentleman further by saying that I believe this is a very proper appropriation to make; and until the United States, legislating for the District of Columbia, provides a place of its own and officers it and pays for it throughout to relieve the old soldiers who happen to drift in here temporarily from time to time, I will take the best means at hand to give them relief and will utilize this private corporation. [Applause.]

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman did not answer my question.

Mr. CANNON. I thought I did answer my friend's question as well as I am able to answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations which has had charge of this bill, I desire to say a few words on the proposition now before the Committee of the Whole.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] moves to strike out a specific appropriation on page 36 for Temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers and Sailors, Grand Army of the Republic, $2,500. It gives me pleasure, gentlemen, to testify that I am in favor of this appropriation, not only in this appropriation bill, but in every succeeding appropriation bill. I am glad that this opportunity has arisen that it may be demonstrated who are the true friends of the Union soldier. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Three of the gentlemen who have assailed this salutary provision, this very proper item in an appropriation bill, are gentlemen who attempted to pose quite recently in this House as special friends of an enlargement of the pension rolls. The very gentleman who makes the motion assumes generally to be a special advocate of the interests of the veterans. Yet he comes into the committee this afternoon and asks you to strike out this specific appropriation. Why is it? It is because he and his friends would rather sacrifice the Union soldier than to give up an opportunity to strike a blow at certain charities which they denominate "sectarian." Sir, I believe in every branch, in every sect of the Christian religion. I am broad enough to take them all in. I am broad enough and liberal enough to advocate an appropriation for each and every charity, be it Catholic, or Lutheran, or Calvanist, or whatever may be the sect to which it belongs.

What is the proposition now before the committee? It is that the Congress of the United States shall declare itself against the rescue of the unfortunate, against the care of the sick, and against every charitable or reformatory institution. While all our States, while all our great cities are constantly ready and eager to contribute to the support of charitable or reformatory institutions, you are asked to take the position that the Congress of the United States, for the first time since the year 1889, is to refuse any contribution for the maintenance and support of institutions which are conceded to be in every respect meritorious and worthy of public confidence and support. I do not believe that this Committee of the Whole will sustain any such proposition.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says he wants an explanation in detail of the work of each and every one of these charities. Why has he not taken the time to read the report of the charitable and reformatory institutions in the District of Columbia? Is he to come in this afternoon and stop the business of the nation until he can glean some information which has been ready at his hands for months past? I say, gentlemen, you would incur a grave responsibility—I do not believe that one of you could rest peacefully to-night, I do not believe that sleep could come to you—if you should commit an act so cruel, so ungenerous, so unworthy as to refuse your support to these charitable institutions.

Now, what do they ask? Some of these institutions are supported entirely through the aid given them by Congress. Others are supported in part—to a greater or less degree—by such aid. But it must be manifest to every student of this subject that these institutions——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask a few moments more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York proceed?

Objection was made.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, it so happens that I know a little about the work of this home, and I desire to give the committee the benefit of what I happen to know. There are a great many old soldiers and sailors who like to visit Washington, but who are barely able to pay their traveling expenses, much less their board bills here. I know of more than one who in the last few years have walked hundreds of miles to get a chance to visit the city of Washington. This city is, as it were, the earthly heaven of many an old soldier and sailor who for years and years risked his health and his life in defense of the union of our country, its Constitution, and its laws.

Such a man glories in an opportunity to visit the city of Washington—to look down from these galleries upon "the assembled wisdom and patriotism of the nation." He wants a chance to go, also, to the other end of the Capitol and look down upon the sages there who represent the States of the United States of America. And he wants to go to the other end of the Avenue and look upon the White House and upon Grover I. He wants to see this magnificent city with its broad avenues, its well-paved streets, its beautiful private residences, and its magnificent public edifices.

It is the height of his ambition to have a chance once more to look upon the capital city of this great nation. But he has not the money to pay hotel bills or boarding-house charges. If he can get here, as he can, by walking (because many of these men are still able to march), or if he can secure money to pay railroad fare, all he wants is an opportunity to spend five, six, seven, eight, nine, or ten days in this city. I understand that ten days is the maximum stay allowed at this institution. He wants some place where he can get a soldier's accommodations—a chance to sleep at night and to obtain rations during the day.

I say that this Congress will be derelict in its duty to these old Union soldiers if it denies them the little pittance of ten days' board at this charitable institution, which during the last year had under its roof no less than 975 of these old soldiers and sailors, gave them no less than 18,000 meals, and furnished 10,385 lodgings. Yet this House that represents the 70,000,000 people of this country is here spending an hour deliberating on the question whether it will vote $2,500 to provide accommodations for such of the three, four, five, or six hundred thousand Union soldiers still living in this land as may desire an opportunity to visit the city once more before they die. [Applause.]

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska obtained the floor.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this amendment subject to division?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The motion is to strike out a single paragraph.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Does it not include several different institutions?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it includes only one.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, in closing the discussion on this paragraph I feel that I can extend to the House and the committee the congratulations which are certainly due. We have been treated to the remarkable spectacle of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] actually declaring himself as the friend of the soldier. The "horse laugh" with which he was greeted testified to the confidence the committee had in the sincerity of his protestation. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, I have but a poor opinion of a man who undertakes to measure his love for the old soldier by voting for an appropriation of $2,500 to any particular institution for the purpose of taking care of such unfortunates as may come temporarily into the District of Columbia. My purpose would not be to prevent any person from receiving charitable aid, as I have already stated. My objection to the pending proposition is that we are making an appropriation to specific institutions, trusting to them in turn to dispense charity. I say it is the wise and beneficent purpose of the Government to directly take care of all of the soldiers. My vote, and every vote I have cast, has been along the line that no soldier should ever enter a poorhouse. The gentleman from New York, however, by his vote and advice, as well as by his actions, which speak louder than words, would send to the poorhouse every old soldier in the land that he possibly could, unless outvoted by the patriotic majority in this House.

But let us put this issue plainly and bluntly. The only question involved is, shall the House of Representatives vote the money of the people to a private institution, for that institution in turn to dispense the charity? I say that you have no right to do it; and this paragraph, as well as the various expenditures proposed in other parts of the bill along this line, mean exactly that and nothing else. No expression of patriotic sentiment, no appeal to loyalty, generosity, nor any other noble attribute, no refinement of language or criticism, can make it otherwise. This paragraph itself, while the expenditure made directly by the Government or by an individual is entirely proper and appropriate, I think is simply the camel's nose inserted into the tent. I ask my friend from Illinois, who I know to be a friend to the old soldier, and charitably inclined, certainly, if he votes for this paragraph, how can he account to the people for a vote against every other paragraph of a similar character, in this charity section of the bill? He can not do it and be consistent.

I wish the House would plant itself squarely upon principle and take care of the old soldier by a sufficient direct appropriation. We have, Mr. Chairman, a Soldiers' Home already here in the District of Columbia; and there is not a State or Territory that has not one or more. We can and will take care of them. If it be suggested that the Soldiers' Home will not temporarily take care of them, or will not care for all soldiers, then it may be time enough for us to take the action proposed here.

Mr. MORSE. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in supposing that the Union soldiers are taken care of in the home here. This home is for the soldiers of the Regular Army.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Very well; if there is no home here for the volunteer soldiers, erect one or open this one to them.

Mr. MORSE. How are you going to manage in the meantime?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Why, you have a committee here which can bring in general legislation to provide for them, if it is necessary. A bill can be drafted in an hour which will do it. You can pass it without delay by unanimous consent, or, if not, it is easy to bring in a rule. Who would oppose it? But let every dollar, whether it be for the support of soldiers and sailors or for any other charitable object, be dispensed directly by officers of the Government who are responsible to the Government for what they do. I insist, Mr. Chairman, there shall be no appropriation except for public purposes; that there shall be no money placed in the hands of anyone for any purpose, charitable or otherwise, who is not directly accountable to the Government for the expenditure. Our system of government is opposed to the principle of allowing money to be expended in any other manner. It is based on the correct principle of accountability to the people and to the Government. You are wandering away from that principle in every appropriation of this character for private purposes.

Now, having said this much, having challenged the attention of the House to what is involved in this subject of charity and in this appropriation, I yield most reluctantly to the appeals made to me to avoid even the semblance of withholding from the soldiers of the nation, who have already been too sorely set upon, and withdraw the motion I made, but will make a similar motion when we reach line 8, on page 38, and move to strike out the item "For the Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish, maintenance, $1,800," and will urge it against each of the items of a sectarian character following. In this way a record may be easily made and the will of this House find expression.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Church Orphanage Association of St. Johns Parish, maintenance, $1,800.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the item just read.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, it has become manifest that we can not complete the consideration of this bill to-night; and I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 5210, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 3, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of Saturday, February 1, was read and approved.

RECOMMITMENT OF A BILL.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GRIFFIN] desires the recommitment to the Committee on Military Affairs of a bill reported from that committee, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2047) for the relief of Charles Fletcher, alias James H. Mitchell.

Mr. HULL. A parliamentary inquiry. That carries with it the report made by the committee, of course?

The SPEAKER. It carries with it the report. Without objection, the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There was no objection.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 5359) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to reserve all points of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. All points of order are reserved.

STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer and typewriter so long as may be necessary, for a period not exceeding three months from the adoption of this resolution, the same to be appointed by the chairman of the committee, subject to the approval of the committee, and to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $6 per day.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the committee find it impossible to do their work without a stenographer, and the other stenographers are employed. We have no stenographer, and I have not been able to answer one letter in ten of those which have been received. This is only for ninety days.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask if the committee stenographers are employed?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. They are otherwise employed, so that we can not secure them as we need them, and we need a stenographer every day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if this were the only resolution of the kind that had come before us, or was to come before us, I should not object; but it seems to me that in the orderly way of transacting business it should first be considered by the Committee on Accounts. That is a committee privileged to report at any time.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman not to object. This employment is only asked for ninety days, and business accumulates in the committee which it is impossible for us to do without this assistance. We can not secure one of the official stenographers to committees, because they are otherwise engaged.

Mr. CANNON. And still, notwithstanding what I believe to be its great merit, I am not willing it should be considered, because it would constitute a precedent.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Let me say one thing further. The committee ask further that they may have leave to sit during the sessions of the House, and it is necessary to have a stenographer to take the evidence that will be submitted right along from day to day for some time.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to the permission to sit during the sessions of the House; and I will say to my friend that as to the other matter, it is only because it would constitute a precedent that I object.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Accounts. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency be allowed to sit during the session. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARKANSAS AND CHOCTAW RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3812) to authorize the Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Choctaw Nation, in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Arkansas, be, and the same is hereby, invested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, owning, equipping, operating, using, and maintaining a railway and telegraph and telephone line through the Choctaw Nation, in the Indian Territory, beginning at the point on the boundary line between the said Choctaw Nation and the county of Little River, in the State of Arkansas, where the said railway may run, when constructed in the State of Arkansas, thence running by the most feasible and practicable route in a northwesterly direction through the said Choctaw Nation, to such point at or near the town of Atoka, in said nation, as said corporation may select, with the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turn-outs, and sidings as said company may deem it to their interest to construct along and upon the right of way and depot grounds herein provided for.

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a railway and telegraph and telephone line, and for no other purpose, a right of way 100 feet in width through the said Choctaw Nation, for the said Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company, the same to be 50 feet on either side of the track of said railway from the center thereof, and, in addition to the above right of way, to take and use a strip of land 200 feet in width, with a length of 3,000 feet, for stations at such points as the said railway company may deem to their interest to erect, with the right to use such additional grounds, where there are heavy cuts or fills, as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed and track, not exceeding 100 feet in width on each side of the said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no more than said addition of land shall be taken for any one station: Provided further, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be leased or sold by the company, and they shall not be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used, such portion shall revert to the Choctaw Nation.

SEC. 3. That before said railway and telegraph and telephone line shall be constructed through any lands held by individual occupants, according to the laws, usages, and customs of the Choctaw Nation, full compensation shall be made to such occupants for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of such railway and telegraph and telephone line. In case of failure to make amicable settlement with any occupant, such compensation shall be determined by the appraisement of disinterested referees, to be appointed, one (who shall act as chairman) by the President, one by the principal chief of the Choctaw Nation, and one by said railway company, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe, before a judge or clerk of a United States court or United States commissioner, an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their award to and filed with the Secretary of the Interior within sixty days from the completion thereof; and upon the failure of either party to make such appointment within thirty days after the appointment made by the President, the vacancy shall be filled by the judge of the United States court for the central district of the Indian Territory upon the application of the other party. A majority of said referees shall be competent to act in case of the absence of a member, after due notice. The chairman of such board shall appoint the time and place for all hearings: Provided, That the hearings shall be within the county where the property is situated for which compensation is being assessed for the taking thereof or damage thereto, and at a place as convenient as may be for said occupant, unless the said occupant and said railway company agree to have the hearing at another place. Each of said referees shall receive for his services the sum of $4 per day for each day he is engaged in assessing compensation, with mileage of 5 cents per mile for each mile necessarily traveled in the discharge of his duties. Said board of referees shall have power to call for and examine witnesses under oath, and said witnesses shall receive the usual fees allowed witnesses by the laws of the Choctaw Nation. Costs, including compensation of the referees, shall be made a part of the award and be paid by the said railway company. In case the referees can not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award.

SEC. 4. That either party, being dissatisfied with the findings and award of the referees, shall have the right, within sixty days after the filing of the award, as hereinbefore provided, and notice of the same, to appeal by original petition to the United States district court for the central district of the Indian Territory sitting at the place nearest and most convenient to the land and property which is sought to be condemned; and said suit shall then proceed for determining the damage done to the property in the same and like manner as other civil actions in the said court. The said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the subject-matter of said petition, and the same shall be heard and determined by said court in accordance with the laws now in force or hereafter enacted for the government of said court; and the measure of damages in condemning property authorized by this act shall be that prescribed by the laws of the State of Arkansas, in so far as the same are not inconsistent with the laws now in force or hereafter enacted for the government of the United States courts in said Choctaw Nation in such cases. If the judgment of the court shall be for a larger sum than the award of the referees, the costs of the litigation shall be adjudged against the railway company, and if the judgment of the court shall be for the same as the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the appellant. If the judgment of the court shall be for a smaller sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages. When proceedings shall have been commenced in court, the railway company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then shall have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of the railroad and telegraph and telephone line. If such appeal is not taken as hereinbefore set forth, the award shall be conclusive and final, and shall have the same force and effect as a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 5. That said railway company is authorized and hereby given the right to connect or cross with its tracks the tracks and railroad of any other company or person owning or operating a railway in the said Choctaw Nation. In case of failure to make amicable settlement with any such corporation or person for such crossing, such compensation shall be determined in the same manner as hereinbefore provided for determining the compensation for land and other property taken and damaged.

SEC. 6. That said railway company shall not charge the inhabitants of said nation a greater rate of freight than the rate authorized by the laws of the State of Arkansas for services or transportation of the same kind: Provided, That passenger rates on said railway shall not exceed 3 cents per mile. Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the charges for freight and passengers on said railway and messages on said telegraph and telephone lines until a State government or governments shall exist in said nation within the limits of which said railway or a part thereof shall be located, and then such State government or governments shall be authorized to fix and regulate the cost of transportation of persons and freights within their respective limits of said railway; but Congress expressly reserves the right to fix and regulate at all times the cost of such transportation by said railway or said company whenever such transportation shall extend from one State into another or shall extend into more than one State: Provided, however, That the rate of such transportation of passengers, local or interstate, shall not exceed the rate above expressed: And provided further, That said railway company shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and until such rate is fixed by law the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation.

SEC. 7. That said railway company shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the Choctaw Nation, the sum of $50, in addition to the compensation provided for in this act, for property taken and damages done to individual occupants by the construction of the railway, for each mile of railway that it may construct in said nation, said payments to be made in installments of $500 as each 10 miles of road is graded: Provided, That if the general council of the Choctaw Nation, within four months after the filing of maps of definite location, as hereinafter set forth, dissents from the allowance hereinbefore provided for, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Interior, then all compensation to be paid to said nation under the provisions of this act shall be determined as provided in section 3 for the determination of the compensation to be paid to the individual occupant of lands, with the right of appeal to the courts upon the same terms, conditions, and requirements as therein provided: Provided further, That the amount awarded or adjudged to be paid by said railway company for said dissenting nation shall be in lieu of the compensation said nation would be entitled to receive under the foregoing provision. Said company shall also pay, so long as said Territory is owned and occupied by the Choctaw Indians, to the Secretary of the Interior the sum of $15 per annum for each mile of railway it shall construct in the said nation. The money paid to the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act shall be disbursed by him in accordance with the laws and treaties now in force within said nation: Provided, That Congress shall have the right, so long as said lands are occupied and possessed by said nation, to impose such additional taxes upon said railway as it may deem just and proper for the benefit of said nation, and any Territory or State hereafter formed through which said railway shall have been established may exercise the like power as to such part of said railway as may lie within its limits. Said railway company shall have the right to survey and locate its railway immediately after the passage of this act.

SEC. 8. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located lines through said nation to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and also to be filed in the office of the principal chief of the said nation; and after the filing of said maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company: Provided, That when a map showing any portion of said railway company's located line is filed as herein provided for, said company shall commence grading said located line within six months thereafter, or such location shall be void; and said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior in sections of 25 miles before the construction of any such section shall be begun.

SEC. 9. That the officers, servants, and employees of said company necessary to the construction and management of said railroad shall be allowed to reside, while so engaged, upon such right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with said intercourse laws.

SEC. 10. That said railway company shall build at least 75 miles of its railway in said nation within three years after the passage of this act, or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built; that said railway company shall construct and maintain continually all roads and highway crossings and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

SEC. 11. That the said Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company shall accept this right of way upon the express condition, binding upon itself, its successors and assigns, that they will neither aid, advise, nor assist any effort looking toward the changing or extinguishing the present tenure of the Choctaw Indians in their land, and will not attempt to secure from the Choctaw Nation any further grant of land or its occupancy than is hereinbefore provided: Provided, That any violation of the condition mentioned in this section shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights and privileges of said railway company under this act.

SEC. 12. That all mortgages, deeds of trust, and other conveyances executed by said railway company, conveying any portion of its railroad, telegraph and telephone lines, with its franchises, that may be constructed in said Choctaw Nation shall be recorded in the Department of the Interior, and the record thereof shall be evidence and notice of their execution and shall convey all rights and property of said company as therein expressed.

SEC. 13. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, alter, or repeal this act.

SEC. 14. That the right of way herein and hereby granted shall not be assigned or transferred in any form whatever prior to the construction and completion of the road except as to mortgages or other liens that may be given or secured thereon to aid in the construction thereof.

The Committee on Indian Affairs recommended the adoption of the following amendments:

In line 8 of section 2, strike out the word "two" and insert "one."

In line 9 of section 2, strike out the word "three" and insert "two."

In lines 13 and 14 of section 2, strike out the words "one hundred" and insert "fifty."

Strike out the proviso to section 8 and insert the following:

"Provided, That a map showing the entire line of the road in the Indian Territory shall be filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior before the construction of the same shall be commenced."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has been reported to the House? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCRAE. There are some committee amendments.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MCRAE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CANNON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for.

Mr. GROUT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, strike out all of lines 8 and 9.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the motion which I made on Saturday evening, and upon which I shall insist, is to strike out lines 8 and 9 on page 38 of the pending bill. These lines read as follows:

For the Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish, maintenance, $1,800.

I desire that there shall be no confusion with respect to these items. It will be necessary for me to refer briefly to the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], which, after a very voluminous editing, in compliance with his usual custom, I find on page 1233 of the RECORD. In that edited speech I find comparison has been instituted between some of the more extensive reformatories in the District of Columbia and the ordinary children's institutions, the item in connection with which we were considering on that day. It will be evident from reference to these edited remarks that the gentleman has sought to institute a comparison between the amounts contributed by the general public to certain institutions as over against the entire cost of maintaining others which are maintained exclusively by the Government, which is, of course, manifestly unfair. Then, in addition, he has seen fit to institute a comparison between the most expensive asylums and hospitals, where difficult surgical operations are performed, as against institutions which care simply for children, many of whom are bound out to private families. As bearing upon this subject, I send up to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter written by Mrs. MacFarland, vice-president of the children's guardians, which explains itself:

The Clerk read as follows:

BOARD OF CHILDREN'S GUARDIANS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
GUNTON BUILDING, 472-478 LOUISIANA AVENUE, NW.,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1896.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to the debate in the House on Saturday upon appropriations for charitable institutions in the District of Columbia. I have read with pleasure what you said about public control of public appropriations for public wards. I would like to call your attention to the statement made in the debate, reported on page 1233 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 1.

The statement there recorded confuses the issue by comparing the work of the board of children's guardians, for children simply dependent, with the work of the most expensive reformatories in the District, with which the board has not, and never could have, anything to do.

If there is any question as to the economy and efficiency of the work of the board of children's guardians, and if the principles upon which it proceeds are assailed, it can be safely said that the per capita cost of this work of the board for its wards has fallen in every department steadily since the work of the board began. The financial statement of the board, published on page 264 of the Report of the Superintendent of Charities upon Charitable and Reformatory Institutions in the District of Columbia for 1895, shows this decline in the per capita cost from every point of view.

I would call your attention particularly to the fact that from the operation of the system pursued by the board its beneficiaries are rapidly passed on to free homes, becoming absorbed in the population of the District and surrounding States, and cease to be dependent upon the public, in any degree, for maintenance.

You will notice in the last line of the second subdivision of the table on the page of the report above referred to that the number of children in free homes who were not at public charge for maintenance rose as between 1894 and 1895 from 46 to 114. The number of wards of the board under guardianship and supervision on January 31, 1896, was 297, of whom 49 were in institutions (the same as those mentioned in your remarks to the House of Representatives on Saturday as receiving public appropriations), and payments are being made to those institutions for the board of those children at a minimum rate of $96 per annum.

There are also supported in the homes of individuals, at public expense for maintenance 57 children, making a total now paid for of 117. As compared with these there are now 180 wards of the board for whom no expenses are being incurred, except, as estimated, per capita expense for 1897 of $12.71 for the salary and expenses of agents, who must visit and supervise them.

Yours, respectfully,

MARY L. D. MACFARLAND.

Hon. EUGENE J. HAINER,
House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will have such time as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Nebraska be permitted to proceed until he concludes his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, my purpose is to insist upon striking out of this appropriation bill each one of the items which appropriate money to these institutions. I also purpose at the appropriate time to ask the adoption by this committee of the amendment which I now send to the desk to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 39, in line 16, after the words "place to place," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert "$61,200; in all, $95,200: Provided, That the institutions for children, including industrial and reformatory, namely, the Church Orphanage of St. John's parish; the German Orphan Asylum, the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children, including its care of colored foundlings; the St. Ann's Infant Asylum, the St. Joseph Asylum, the House of the Good Shepherd, the Industrial Home School, and St. Rose's Industrial School, heretofore receiving aid by specific appropriation, are hereby remitted, except as herein specifically appropriated for, to the appropriation herein made, and to the said act of July 26, 1892, to provide for the care of dependent children in the District of Columbia, and to create a board of children's guardians, for all rights and benefits which they may have under the provisions of the said act."

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Gentlemen will observe that this amendment which I will propose takes care of all the children, all the dependents, that may properly be taken care of under the paragraphs of the pending bill. Let no member, then, lay the flattering unction to his soul that by voting down this amendment he will take care of the dependent children, or that by voting for it he will take bread out of their mouths. The purpose of this motion is not to reduce the expenditures for the laudable purpose of taking care of these children, but it is to place the appropriation for the care of these institutions where it properly belongs, namely, that whenever a dollar of public money is appropriated, with that dollar shall go public control; that there shall be no such thing as private control where the bills are footed by Uncle Sam. We will abundantly take care of every one of these dependents, including those heretofore controlled by the institution the appropriation for which I now propose to strike out here.

It has been suggested during the course of this debate that these several institutions make reports and are under the control of the Government. I beg gentlemen not to be deceived by any such proposition as that, because it is not well founded in fact. I hold in my hand the report for 1894 made by the superintendent of charities, Colonel Tracey. In that document will be found no report whatever from the Church Orphanage of St. John's Parish. There is, it is true, a letter which came too late to be incorporated as a report, which, in general terms, refers to the necessities of the institution, but there is nothing that can possibly be called a report. So, Mr. Chairman, as I look further into the report made for 1895, I find Colonel Tracey himself, in defining his duties, stated that they are advisory only, and that is all they can be claimed to be under the law. He can advise with the heads of these institutions, and doubtless does, but that is all. If gentlemen will look over these reports, not only the report of Colonel Tracey, but the reports of these various institutions made to him, it will be found that they have organized themselves into a mutual admiration society, the various institutions complimenting Colonel Tracey, and Colonel Tracey in turn most effusively complimenting the various institutions. They remind one of those fragrant flowers which are said to bloom even on the garden walls of politics, and whose redolence has doubtless charmed us all; but, so far as giving us any practical information as to what these institutions are doing, they are absolutely nil. So it is that, aside from the great principle for which I am contending and in the maintenance of which I should have the assistance of every Representative on this floor, I insist there is every reason for voting in favor of this amendment and finally placing the control and care of these worthy objects of charity where they belong, namely, in the hands of the board of children's guardians.

Mr. HENDERSON. May I ask the gentleman a question about his amendment?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do I understand that this amendment puts the money here appropriated for different institutions in the hands of the board of children's guardians?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The amendment which is now pending strikes out this specific appropriation for the Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish.

Mr. HENDERSON. And others?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I propose to follow it up with other amendments, striking out other specific appropriations for sectarian institutions, and then I will follow that——

Mr. HENDERSON. Here is the point I want to get at: Does the gentleman's amendment require the board of children's guardians to give any specific sum to this institution—for instance, the St. John's Church Orphanage Association?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No, sir; but it remits the children under the charge of the institution to the care of the board of children's guardians, and for which the aid of public money may be asked under the operation of the laws under which the board of children's guardians are acting.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has the gentleman examined the act of 1892 creating the board of children's guardians?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has the gentleman examined it to see whether it will apply to children now in these institutions? Does not that law apply to children sent there by order of the court? These children being in these institutions, will it be possible for the board of children's guardians to have jurisdiction over them under the law? I ask this question because I remember that when this matter was arranged in conference we found difficulty under the act of 1892 and had to segregate the appropriations in the manner that we did in order to be sure to take care of the children in these institutions.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The question of the gentleman from Iowa is one that should be frankly met and answered. The action which I propose to take now would not make adequate provision for all of the children in this institution to be taken care of by the board of children's guardians. Let me say, however, that this Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish is supported largely, and indeed mainly, by private fund. It is under the patronage of one of the Episcopal churches of this city and they have a large fund and valuable property. They have property valued at $50,000, as shown by their own reports. During the last year they paid on an existing indebtedness, out of the receipts which came to them for the year, over $6,000. I gave the items in my remarks on Saturday. Therefore they have ample means to take care of such children as would not be provided for by this appropriation. Every dollar which is sought to be appropriated under this item of the bill will go to the board of children's guardians, and they will expend it for the benefit of children for whom we may properly appropriate here.

Mr. WHEELER. How can the board of children's guardians take care of the children now in St. John's Orphanage Association?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. My dear sir, they can not take care of them all, but they can take care of part of them, and all of the money will be used to take care of children for whom we may properly appropriate.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman tell the House how they would proceed to do it?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The board of children's guardians can, for instance, place the children there. Every child that is sent to that institution by order of the court, every child that is properly subjected to their charge can be sent there.

Mr. WHEELER. Then you propose that the children who are now in the St. John's Church Orphanage Asylum shall be forcibly taken away and placed with the children who are sent to the board of children's guardians by the police court.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Oh, no; there is nothing of that kind; there is no forcible taking away whatever, and there is no intelligence in such a suggestion.

Mr. HENDERSON. The point which I make is this: We have spent a good deal of time over this matter in conference in past years, and we have tried to frame the appropriation so as to put the expenditure of the money appropriated for this purpose under the board of children's guardians, but we found that the existing law had no reference to children who were in these institutions before the passage of the act, and that the moneys could only be expended through the board of guardians for the benefit of children sent to them by the court after the passage of the law; so that we were powerless to take care of the children in these institutions who had not been sent there by order of the court, as contemplated by the act of 1892.

Now, whatever we may wish to do here (and I am not touching the merits of the question to which the gentleman has been directing his remarks), I protest against leaving these children where they will not be cared for by this Government so far as we, in our wisdom, think the Government should help them. The gentleman in his opening remarks said that none of us need be alarmed by the fear that the children would not be cared for. The gentleman, I believe, is a good lawyer; and if he will scrutinize the act of 1892—I am only speaking of it now from recollection, for I did not know this matter was coming up—he will find that if we appropriate the money in the way he proposes we shall leave all these institutions where these helpless children are in such a condition that the money can not go to the aid of those who were in the institution before any order of the court was issued under the act of 1892. Therefore, I caution the gentleman to consider this matter well before he presses his amendment.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's caution needs absolutely no apology. I certainly should be the last person to turn out of any home any child. I certainly should be the last person to withhold any aid from any worthy human being. I call the gentleman's attention, however, to the fact that the law of 1892 has already been in operation four years, and the argument which was cogently urged at that time can not obtain now, or certainly not with such great force.

At that time no provision could be made under the law providing for the board of children's guardians which would have antedated the act. But let me again call the attention of the committee to the fact that these institutions are supported largely by private contributions. These private contributions will amply support all the children who are not properly objects of public charity, or who were in the institution prior to the passage of the act of 1892. And further than that I know of no reason, nor can my friend from Iowa, who is a good lawyer, suggest any reason, why any child who is properly a public charge can not to-day, upon its condition being shown to be such as to entitle it to the relief proposed, bring itself within the operation of this law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I should like to inquire of the gentleman for information, how large a percentage of the gross expenditures of the Church Orphans' Association is represented by the $1,800 proposed to be appropriated.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Less than one-fifth. The report shows that the institution receives more than $10,000, and out of that sum it had not only money enough to take care of every child in the institution, but was able to pay over $6,000 on antecedent debts. So that it can not be claimed that the institution has not funds enough.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Would it not be a concise way of putting the argument—I submit the question to the gentleman from Nebraska—to say that it is the duty of the Government in the expenditure of public funds to build, if necessary, the institution wherein this $1,800 is to be expended, rather than to appropriate the public funds to a Catholic, a Baptist, a Methodist, or any other sectarian institution?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. If the gentleman followed my remarks on last Saturday he will remember that I made the contention then that we had no right to spend a single dollar of the public money for any private purpose. I still adhere to that argument. I believe it is the only sound and safe argument for us—the only correct principle upon which we can plant our feet; and we should not allow any appeal to sentiment to swerve us from these correct principles.

This country is large enough and rich enough to take care of every worthy person who can properly appeal to us for assistance. We ought to render this assistance, however, through the medium of public instrumentalities. As I have said before, with every dollar of public appropriation there should go public supervision and public control. We have absolutely no right to appropriate one dollar to A, B, C, or D, however philanthropic they may be, however good and meritorious their work may be. We have no right to appropriate one dollar to any individuals, in the faith and hope that they in turn will properly expend that money.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Allow me to ask, does this institution receive children generally—all that are brought there—or only such as belong to the church having charge of the institution?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Oh, I do not know as to that. I assume that they allow every deserving child to come in.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is no sectarian discrimination in the reception of children.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. So I understand. I concede that in the administration of this institution there is absolutely nothing wrong. I do not wish to befog or becloud this discussion by making assaults upon any institution. I am willing to concede that this institution is doing the good work which the amiable superintendent of charities says it does. I am making no assault upon any of these institutions. I am simply seeking to rest appropriations of money upon sound principles and to provide that not one dollar of public money shall be devoted to private or sectarian purposes.

I have already called attention to the fact that this is but the entering wedge. Why, sir, the report of the superintendent of charities informs us in plain terms that we are expending more than half a million dollars per annum upon institutions which are private in their character. We have large appropriations of this kind in the sundry civil bill and in the Indian appropriation bill and in various forms. This is simply the commencement, and I should like to have the present Congress at the very threshold face this matter fairly and squarely. On last Saturday I yielded to importunities, which were showered upon me from all hands, not to persist in a motion which seemed to bear upon the veteran soldiers of this country. The appeal was made, and I confess, in a moment of weakness, I yielded to that sentiment in which I personally shared. But every time that you let down the bars, every time that you yield principle to sentiment, whether the amount involved is $2,500 or $1,800 or any other trifling sum, you are compromising the only true principle upon which we should proceed in these matters.

Mr. CANNON. Just there would it embarrass my friend to ask him a question?

If these specific appropriations, one of which he moves to strike out, are all stricken from the law, and his subsequent amendment which he has suggested be adopted, increasing the appropriation to the board of children's guardians under the law, under that appropriation is it not entirely competent for that board—the board of children's guardians—to remit children that it has charge of to the care of these very institutions which the gentleman refers to and which he wishes to strike from the bill?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Unquestionably.

Mr. CANNON. Do they not do it now out of the funds which they now have?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have no information as to that, although I think it possible that they may do so.

Mr. CANNON. Further, let me ask, how can the gentleman from Nebraska justify himself, from his standpoint, for offering an amendment here that will enable this very board of children's guardians to utilize these sectarian institutions which he professes to be cutting up by the roots?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I am very glad, indeed, to have the gentleman from Illinois ask the question, for it is a proper question and demands an answer.

If my contention prevails, then the board of children's guardians may place children there, as they do in homes or in private families; they may leave them there a week or a month, but they have the absolute control of them. Another thing—they pay only while the children are there and pay only for such children as they may send to the institution. They have control of them, just as my friend from Illinois has control of his own children; if he sends one to a boarding school, he can take it away at any time he pleases, can make different arrangements, can give directions and orders respecting it, and retains control at all times of the child. The children in these institutions, under such circumstances, become a public charge, and in that respect they are as they should be.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me just at this point, for we both want to get at the exact facts.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman know that there is no dollar expended under any of these appropriations to private institutions but what, in detail, is reported to and audited by the auditing officer of the Treasury; first by the District officials, then by the auditing officers of the Treasury, so that a full account is given of every cent appropriated, and at the same time a full statement of every cent that comes from private sources, and thus we give the Government supervision and accounting under the other practice?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. My friend is entirely mistaken in his facts.

Mr. CANNON. Well, on the contrary, my friend is entirely mistaken in that statement, as I shall endeavor to show later on.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have in my hand the report of the superintendent of charities for 1894. I know my friend is a far-sighted gentleman, but he can not see things that do not exist. He is entitled to a magnificent chromo if he can find a specific report of this institution there. This appropriation is made in gross. They do expend their appropriations, it is true.

Now, in 1895, if my friend will turn to the report of this institution, he will find a statement of receipts amounting to over $10,000, and over $6,000 of that was paid out on a number of items of existing indebtedness. Then, I ask my friend, does he pretend to say that there is segregated the Government appropriations from other receipts? This appropriation of the Government which should be used entirely for the support of the children, was it separated from other moneys? They make, it is true, not a sworn, but a sort of perfunctory, report of a part of what they receive. It may be all or it may be a part. But no person can find how that specific appropriation of $1,800 provided by the act is expended. There is nothing in the report to indicate it, except as they show the expenditures in gross.

Mr. CANNON. Now, at this point—for it goes to the very core of the question—if the gentleman will allow me, I will say to him that, after careful inquiry, he is mistaken, and I call his attention to page 33 of the law that creates the superintendent of charities. It is in these terms:

> And it shall also be the duty of said superintendent to examine into the character of the administration of said institutions and associations, and the conditions, sufficiency, and needs of the buildings occupied for such charitable purposes, and also to ascertain in each case the amount contributed from private sources for support and construction, the number of paid employees, and the number of inmates received and benefited by the sums appropriated by Congress, and to recommend such changes and modifications therein as in his judgment will secure economy, efficiency, and the highest attainable result in the administrations of charities in the District of Columbia, etc.

And further on we find this:

> Ordered, That hereafter all vouchers for expenditures of appropriations for charitable and reformatory institutions and purposes which receive aid from the District of Columbia shall be submitted to the superintendent of charities for review and approval, and when so examined and approved transmitted from that officer to the auditor of the District of Columbia.
> By order.
> WM. TINDALL, Secretary.

Further, on inquiry I find that there is no dollar of money expended but what the accounts are delivered in detail through this process and under this law, and go to the Auditor of the Treasury Department, and are audited just as the expenses of the War and Navy and other services of the Government are audited, and I was under that impression, but I verified it and find that it is absolutely true under the law and under the practice. Not a dollar or a cent is expended in any of these institutions without passing the lynx eye of even Mr. Bowler, the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of my friend to the fact that he has been reading simply from the law. It matters but little what is in the law. It depends very much on the administration. Now, turning to page 7 of the report of the same superintendent for the year 1894, after quoting the same law which my friend has read with very many manifestations of physical energy——

Mr. CANNON. My friend will allow me?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Why, certainly.

Mr. CANNON. He is an honest man——

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. It is impossible, if I talk at all, that I shall not talk as directly as I know how, and I am not responsible for the physical energy God gave me. I can not help it.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I should not help it if I could——

Mr. CANNON. Thank you.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Except to increase it; and I trust that many years will be given to the gentleman, and that each successive year his strength, like the eagle's, will be renewed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was about to call attention to page 7 of the report of 1894.

Mr. CANNON. I have not the report of 1894. I have the last report, for 1895.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. After quoting in extenso the same law which my friend has quoted, the superintendent says:

> The duties thus imposed, advisory as to legislation and administrative organization, are necessarily of an executive nature, in the general direction of expenditures authorized by law.

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. They are "simply advisory."

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Ah, I have read the words.

Mr. CANNON. And administrative, as are other public expenditures; not advisory. The gentleman is not happy in construing the very language of the superintendent.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have given it in hæc verba, as the gentleman can see if he will examine the report.

Mr. CANNON. But it does not convey the same idea to the gentleman's mind as it does to mine. Now, the contention is that there can not be one dollar drawn from or expended by this service without it goes into the hands of a bonded officer of the United States, and that bonded officer only pays it out upon itemized accounts; that it is audited by the auditor for the District of Columbia; that it goes to the auditing office of the Treasury Department for final audit just as every other dollar of public expenditure goes.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Now, let us put this matter fairly before this committee.

Mr. CANNON. That is what I am trying to do.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Now, my friend's contention—if it has any practical force—is that for this $1,800 which is sought to be appropriated, the same, I believe, as it was last year, there is a specific and itemized report made showing just exactly how that $1,800 was expended, that it was expended for the benefit of certain specific and specified public charges. If that were true, very much of the contention which I am now making would have no practical force.

Mr. CANNON. It is absolutely true.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Now, here is the report, and I call my friend's attention to it. In 1894 they made absolutely no report, and in 1895 the report is found commencing on page 207. I will ask my friend to follow me in the reading of that report. It shows that the receipts from various sources for that year amounted to $10,429.77.

Mr. GRAFF. Who received that?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The institution received it.

Mr. GRAFF. What institution?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That is the Church Orphanage Association of St. John's, commenced with April, 1894, "May, 1894, $368.29, paid on orders of Sister Sarah for maintenance."

Now, then, it goes into hundreds of dollars, total maintenance, including fuel, lights, etc., which aggregates $3,301.15, or less than one-third of the total receipts of the institution. Now, then, the expenditures, which passed the "lynx eye" of this Comptroller, and as shown there, also aggregates $10,429.75, including balance of $328.82 yet on hand. I read the items:

Insurance	$58.75
Interest paid	386.50
Printing annual report, etc	35.50
Rent of safe-deposit box	5.00
Notes to Eugene Bettes and interest	1,627.33
Paid Riggs & Co. on orphanage debt	5,000.00
Balance with the United States Treasurer	286.72
Balance with Riggs & Co	328.82

And then, on the following page, under the head of donations, I find here an aggregate of $794.75. I ask my friend where does that appear in the accounts which were submitted of receipts? And yet again——

Mr. CANNON. Well, I want to answer your question right at that point. This report is only a general statement of expenditures. My friend understands that there could be no reports of audited accounts in detail. If there was, then for the public service there would not be room enough in the new Library to hold them. And at that point let me say that this $1,800 appropriated from the public fund in aid of this work, to this private institution, that has nearly $10,000 income besides the $1,800 that it receives—and the $1,800 goes out of the Treasury into the hands of a disbursing officer of the United States, the treasurer of this institution, and he can only settle his accounts of that $1,800 as other disbursing officers settle their accounts. I say to my friend again that I suspected this was true, but since the last sitting of this committee I have absolutely exhausted all means of information, and now stand and say that I have found it to be absolutely true.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman asked the question where this $749.70 is accounted for. You will find it in the fourth item, $749.70. That is where it is accounted for.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Now, I wish to say to my friend from Illinois the point I make is this: The $1,800, or whatever amount is appropriated by the Government, has never been segregated in any account which he can find, either general or specific. The accounts here given have been presented, and have been passed, including, as I have already shown, the amount of money which was paid on its indebtedness; and so I find, as I have already suggested, this institution has received aid not only in these annual appropriations for maintenance ostensibly, but it has received even $10,000, which it has invested in property. On page 209 of this report I find the following——

Mr. CANNON. What report is that?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It is the report for 1895, on page 209, near the bottom of the page:

> Congress has been liberal in providing for the original purchase of the orphanage building, and later for an addition thereto. It has also appropriated an annual sum for maintenance, beginning in 1883 with $1,500, and increasing that amount in 1891 to $2,000, when the enlarged building and an increasing number of inmates had rendered that greater sum absolutely needful.
> In 1896, however, Congress was induced to enter upon a plan of appropriating a part only of what had in previous years been awarded to public charitable institutions of the District, and remitting those institutions for the remainder to the board of children's guardians.

So we have the fact established and remaining that this large appropriation has been made by the Government to assist this private institution in building an orphanage, the title of which is in private parties, and the value of which is constantly appreciating in the passing years. We are appropriating sums—last year $1,800—when their revenues were sufficient to enable them, as I have already called your attention, to pay over $6,000 of their antecedent debt. It can not, then, by any refinement of argument or by any persuasion of the gentleman from Illinois be made plausible to this House that this $1,800 was necessary for maintenance. Had we not appropriated that $1,800 they would simply have paid $1,800 less of their indebtedness. How many institutions of this country have gone into debt in the past year? Uncle Sam went into debt $162,000,000; but this institution, which comes to us with outstretched hands asking charity, paid of its indebtedness over $6,000, besides the amount which it had paid on interest. Now, I ask the gentlemen of this committee is there any real reason for this further appropriation?

What reason can you give to justify your action to your constituencies? Here is a nation which has gone into debt $162,000,000 in the past eighteen months; here are the printing presses in motion turning out bonds of the United States to pay practically current expenses. And yet we are called upon to appropriate money to the wards of one of the richest churches of this city, an institution which, while it is doing good work, has for its patrons the millionaire ladies of this country. We can, it is true, appropriate to this institution an additional $1,800 to pay on its indebtedness, which indebtedness was created for the purpose of enabling the institution to carry property in this city and its country home in Virginia, property which is appreciating in value. But gentlemen say: "These poor children will suffer if we do not make this appropriation."

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am tired and the country is tired of seeing wealthy institutions masquerading behind the widows and orphans. I am not wanting in consideration, but I want no false pretenses in this matter. The gentleman from Illinois can read the reports. I have called his attention to the fact of the expenditure of this large amount of money for the payment of debts. Those figures are more eloquent than even the speech of the gentleman from Illinois. They demonstrate absolutely that there is no necessity for this appropriation. The principle upon which it is sought to make appropriations to this and other private institutions is fraught with danger and is wrong and pernicious in every sense. It can not be justified, and even the flimsy pretext of a necessity is swept away by the logic of the figures which I have introduced.

No, gentlemen, you can not justify this appropriation. Try it as much as you can, but the plain people all over this land of ours, never wanting in charitable instincts and purposes, will never submit to an appropriation of money to these institutions which have really no need for them. This institution can use the appropriation; of course it can. So can my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. So could I use it; so could every other member of this House of Representatives use this appropriation. Remember, gentlemen, that there are charitable institutions all over this country. The people of my State, who have endured a combination of drought, Debsism, and Democracy [laughter], and from which, thanks to a vigorous constitution, they are rapidly recovering, could very well use this appropriation, and much more than this. But they do not ask it, and neither should this institution ask it. The children who are there, and who may properly be entitled to the public care, can be remitted to the board of children's guardians, who will amply take care of every child that is properly a public charge. In closing, I wish to call attention to a suggestion which has been sent to me by some kind friend, which is that the expenditures in each and every one of these cases are invariably made in advance of the auditing. The expenditures are all made by private persons. The appropriation is made here in gross, and when the vouchers are presented, provided only they are for maintenance of the institution, there is nothing to be done but accept them. The money is already gone.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask to be indulged for somewhat more than five minutes, as I want to talk about these appropriations, not having yet done so to any great extent.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be given unlimited time.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that I shall occupy more than ten or fifteen minutes. I will deal first with the last point made by the gentleman from Nebraska, a point furnished, as he tells us, by some anonymous person, and one as to which he ought not to have allowed himself to be imposed upon to the extent of voicing it here. The gentleman says that these appropriations are expended before the accounting. Of course they are. There is no appropriation made for the carrying on of this Government but that the expenditure is made before the accounting. In the very nature of things it is impossible that it should be otherwise, because if you were required to account before you expended, you could not do it; as there would not be anything to account for.

How are Government expenditures made? A bonded officer of the Government, called a disbursing officer, files his bond. Then a requisition is made by the proper authority. He takes the money and expends it according to that authority, and if he fails to keep within his authority it is at his own peril, because he can not settle his accounts. Now, this $1,800 appropriation is expended exactly in that way, just as the expenditures are made for the Army, for the Navy, for this House of Representatives, for the whole public service everywhere. I commend my friend from Nebraska to talk to the law and the pending amendments, and I will try to do so myself.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that I have taken occasion to go to the bottom of this question, and I hold myself personally responsible for every statement of fact that I shall introduce here. I want to have this appropriation disposed of in view of the facts and not in view of general declamation. I can stand and declaim with my friend from Nebraska that I, too, believe in the Government making its own expenditures. I am not a member of any church, and the doubts which cluster in my mind as to whether anybody knows anything certainly about the matter to the exclusion of all others makes me wonderfully charitable to them all. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for me to declaim as to what my position is upon that general subject. I stand here as a Representative to do my duty. It is not necessary for me to legislate in the light of declamation; I prefer to legislate in the light of facts. On the general question I am not without record. I do not believe in sectarianism being supported at the public expense. General Grant inaugurated the peace policy with the Indians, and there grew up a church educational service in connection with the Indians, and as the years rolled around there developed an abuse. I had the honor to draft an amendment, which was offered in this House in a recent Congress, and which put in process of ultimate extinction the use of public money for sectarian education among the Indians. We did not undertake to stop it all at once, because if we had cut it off in the twinkling of an eye, before the Government was ready to furnish adequate facilities for educating the Indians, they would have gone without instruction; but the abuse is in the course of being wiped out. Wise legislation takes account of the surroundings and the circumstances, and moves judiciously in the right direction, taking care to cause as little disturbance and to do as little injustice as possible to the actual interests involved.

Now, having said this much by way of preface, let us look at what the facts in this case are.

Prior to 1892 we had two methods of relieving poor children and others in this District. One, practiced to a considerable extent, was to absolutely build the asylum or house of correction or other building where these persons were to be placed, superintend its operations, and pay all the expense. Another method, practiced during many years, was and is to cooperate with charitably minded people in contributing a part of the expense from the Government Treasury, they contributing the bulk of it from private means. Right or wrong, that was the system; like Topsy, "it growed." But in 1892 we commenced to take a new departure, and legislation was enacted to which I pray the attention of the House. This legislation created the board of children's guardians, with what powers?

I read the law:

That said board shall have the care and supervision of the following classes of children: First, all children committed under section 2 of the act of February 12, 1885, entitled "An act for the protection of children in the District, and for other purposes"; second—

Now I ask gentlemen to follow me in what I am about to read—

all children who are destitute of suitable homes and adequate means of earning an honest living; all children abandoned by their parents or guardians; all children of habitually drunken or vicious or unfit parents; all children habitually begging on the streets or from door to door; all children kept in vicious or immoral associations; all children known by their language or life to be vicious or incorrigible—

Now, is there any limitation in this? Observe the limitation. Here it is:

whenever such children may be committed to the care of the board by the police court or the criminal court of the District.

And then the necessary power is given to carry out the objects of the act. Under that law no child can pass under the jurisdiction of this board of children's guardians until it has had its day in court and has been adjudicated to belong to one of these classes designated, and is formally branded as having criminal instincts, or being unfortunate, or otherwise coming under some one of these definitions, and is also destitute. When that fact has been solemnly adjudged by the court the child is committed to the care of this board.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the board of children's guardians, as shown by their report, are doing nothing at all with "incorrigible" children. Those are properly taken care of by the Reform School, or similar institutions. I submit, therefore, that the construction which the gentleman is now placing upon the act of 1892 is hardly warranted. He is not justified in assuming that when a child is placed under the guardianship of this board there is any stigma or stain put upon it. There is absolutely nothing of that kind contemplated by the law.

Mr. CANNON. I know there is a Reform School that takes care of those children who have committed criminal acts, etc., and there are other institutions having similar purposes. The language of the act is:

All children kept in vicious or immoral associations, all children known by their language or life to be vicious or incorrigible, whenever such children may be committed, etc.

Now, this law went into force July 26, 1892. At the next session of Congress—the Fifty-second Congress, of which I had not the honor to be a member—the Committee on Appropriations, following the construction then given to that act, in reporting the District appropriation bill, struck out all child-caring charitable institutions and gave to the board of children's guardians the appropriations which had previously been given to such institutions. The bill passed the House in that shape, with all these institutions struck out, just as the gentleman from Nebraska now wants them struck out here. But the Senate restored the various institutions, giving them 70 per cent of the amounts of the previous appropriations. In conference the amounts were reduced to about 60 per cent, the other 40 per cent amounting to $24,200, being given to the board of children's guardians; and of that sum the board in its legitimate work was able to spend only about $17,000, leaving a balance of more than $7,000, which it was earnestly recommended (House Executive Document 103) before the close of the year should be distributed among the child-caring institutions; but the year closed before the deficiency bill was acted on.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Right there will my friend allow me to incorporate in his remarks——

Mr. CANNON. I would rather the gentleman should not "incorporate" anything in my remarks; but if he has any question touching this point, I will yield to him.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I desire, then, to ask my friend whether he has not overlooked a very significant part of the report of the superintendent of charities for the year 1895, page 269, in which reference is made to this board of children's guardians, and in which the following language is used:

It will be noticed that nearly all of the commitments promoted by our agent appear to have been for simple destitution, the number shown as having been rescued from immoral surroundings and taken from drunken and unfit parents having almost disappeared. This difference is more apparent than real. It has been found that it is much easier to prove that a child is "destitute of suitable home and adequate means of earning an honest living" than that he is the child of "drunken and unfit parents," or "kept in vicious or immoral associations," notwithstanding the fact that his destitution and lack of means of earning an honest living were the direct results of the "unfit" character of his parents or the "vicious and immoral" nature of his home associations.

No incorrigible children have been presented for commitment by our agent. It has been known throughout the year—that the funds at the disposal of the board would not be sufficient to meet the demands upon it, and this class of children are always most expensive and troublesome to deal with. There are several reasons why the board could not give them terms of institution training, and to place them in free private homes without such training would simply be to turn them loose upon unsuspecting persons entitled to better treatment.

This shows that instead of there being a surplus of funds there is a deficit of funds in the hands of this public institution, the board of children's guardians.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend can contain himself until I can complete a statement of what has been done since this law of 1892 was passed, he will find that he and I do not disagree about the facts. If we do, it is my friend's misfortune, because I speak from the record. I say, the first year there was $7,000 which the board of children's guardians did not spend.

Now let me go on to the next step. At the first regular session of the Fifty-third Congress—the Congress just preceding this—the Committee on Appropriations again reported the District appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending 1895, omitting the child-caring institutions, and giving the money direct to the board of children's guardians; but after discussion of that provision (see RECORD, volume 139, page 2835), the institutions were restored to the bill in the same sums given in the previous year; that is, on the basis of 60 per cent for private institutions and 40 per cent to the board of children's guardians. That is the next step.

The Senate increased the amount for these institutions to about 90 per cent of the sums at both of the previous Congresses for the board of children's guardians, in order to give them approximately all that they had previously received, exclusive of what the board of children's guardians had expended, and relieved them of that—the board having reduced the expenditures $7,700 of the preceding year, an amount equal to the sum not expended the year before. In 1894 the board of children's guardians received $24,700, and for 1895 it was reduced on the basis of the expenditures to $17,000. For 1896 the appropriation was increased to $20,000, and they come now asking a further appropriation for the balance of this fiscal year; and I feel that I am warranted in stating, as they now, for the first time, ask this relief, that the deficiency will be given for the full amount, and I have no doubt it ought to be on the regular deficiency appropriation bill.

For 1897 this bill recommends $27,400 for the board of children's guardians. There is no man in the House or in the country that welcomes efficient work by the board of children's guardians, under the law creating it, more than I do, and it is working. The first year it could not expend but $17,000; the next year about the same amount was expended; the next year it asked an appropriation of $20,000, and now comes asking for a deficiency. The coming year it is asking $27,000, and we have written every dollar of it in the appropriation bill. This board of children's guardians is growing, and I welcome its growth; and let me say, in passing, that the true friend of charity, from the standpoint of the Government administering its own appropriations, is the man that intelligently, without being prejudiced, founds that system and promotes its growth, traveling with the appropriations hand in hand with the efficiency of the service.

Now, what did the Committee on Appropriations do? In the light of this act of 1892, in the light of the action of Congress, the Congress before the last one, and in the light of the action of the last Congress at both its sessions, we recognized the growth of the board of children's guardians and gave them every cent they asked. We say to them: "Well done; we are glad you are becoming established;" and we are at the same time following along the line of caring for these helpless children as Congress did care for them and make the appropriations in the same direction until we can care for them otherwise.

Now, a word further. I hold in my hand a statement, and I call my friend's attention to it, made this morning by the president of the board of children's guardians, Mr. Simon Wolf, for thirty years a resident of this District, by birth and religion an Israelite, a man of broad views, a magnificent citizen, a man who has been conversant through all these years with charity, and he justifies the wisdom of the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations following the precedent we did follow in the words which I will ask the Clerk to read. I claim the attention of the House, especially the attention of my friend from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER], while it is being read.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
House of Representatives, February 3, 1896.

STATEMENT OF MR. SIMON WOLF, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF CHILDREN'S GUARDIANS AND CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE GERMAN ORPHAN ASYLUM.

Mr. CANNON. How long have you lived in the District?

Mr. WOLF. Thirty-four years.

Mr. CANNON. Have you had occasion during a portion or all of that time to have had your attention directed to the charities of the District?

Mr. WOLF. Very much so.

Mr. CANNON. How long have you been president of the board of children's guardians?

Mr. WOLF. Since the institution was organized, with the exception of a part of a year in which Miss Loring was president, when I had resigned.

Mr. CANNON. Am I correct in understanding that the board of children's guardians only obtain jurisdiction of children by commitment through the courts?

Mr. WOLF. Entirely so.

Mr. CANNON. Is the work of the board of children's guardians growing?

Mr. WOLF. It is steadily increasing and would be much larger were our appropriations larger, as we can not take care of as many children as are applied for.

Mr. CANNON. Your estimates for this year are $27,400.

Mr. WOLF. Yes, sir; and a deficiency also. The amount necessary for feeble-minded children is inadequate in consequence of the high rates claimed at Elwin, Pa. We have been trying several other places, but we find the color line forms an important factor.

Mr. CANNON. These are institutions to which you commit feeble-minded children?

Mr. WOLF. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. In the present condition of charitable work in the District and of legislation covering the power of the board of children's guardians, what would be the practical effect for this fiscal year of a failure to appropriate for the utilization of the various private charities?

Mr. WOLF. A calamity for those institutions without conferring adequate authority upon the board of children's guardians. Before any such radical step could be taken further legislation is indispensably necessary, as the board is in a state of evolution. It has to propagate its ideas by practical work, and while we have accomplished much, and while primarily we claim that all appropriations given by the Government for the care of indigent children in the District of Columbia should go through us, we are not so blind as to ignore the tradition, sentiment, and feelings of a large number of well-disposed, well-meaning, kind-hearted, and charitable people.

Mr. CANNON. What would be the effect (without further legislation) upon the children who will be really entitled to relief, of the withholding of appropriation from the various private institutions?

Mr. WOLF. I think it would cripple private institutions and prove a great harm to many deserving people who, from a feeling of religion, habits, or traditions, do not like to have their misfortunes dragged into the public courts, and thus, while a principle would be observed, much practical harm might ensue for the present.

Mr. CANNON. Then, I understand you, from the standpoint of complete administration, through strictly governmental agencies, or Government appropriations, under existing conditions, without further legislation, such appropriations are not desirable.

Mr. WOLF. Not at present. In regard to the German Orphan Asylum, I will state that as far as the Government controlling expenses in any of these private institutions under existing law and rules adopted by the Commissioners, every dollar that is appropriated must be drawn from the Treasury of the United States. The treasurer or the auditing officer must give bond, and the vouchers must be submitted and passed through the auditing branches of the Government before any further appropriation can be utilized for said institutions. Every safeguard is thrown around the children of the German Orphan Asylum, which institution is strictly nonsectarian, having all shades of religious opinion represented on the board. This is also true of the board of children's guardians. All shades of opinion, as well as both colors, are represented on said board.

I will state that practically I have always been opposed to any union of church and state, and that I have so declared to friends. And once, when I appeared before the committee of the constitutional convention in the State of New York, I claimed that the Jews ought not to ask any money to be given by the Government; but, notwithstanding, I have opinions fixed, and therefore I recognize the conditions and do not believe in radical measures without first preparing the public mind. I think that reforms should go hand in hand with efficiency of public service.

I wish to state, if it is at all desirous, that the superintendent of charities, who is present, has been most efficient and energetic and in every way possible seems to be imbued with a single purpose to do his duty.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, that is the statement of a man who has been almost constantly at the head of the board of children's charities since its creation. Now, let us look at it practically. The Committee on Appropriations, under the rule of the House, can not report general legislation. It is subject to points of order, and absolutely prohibited by the rules, as gentlemen have seen on this bill. Mr. Simon Wolf says that without further legislation the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska, if enacted into law, would be most disastrous. To whom? Why, to the children. What do you make the appropriations for? To care for those who somehow or other in the operations of God's law are unfortunate. I would have the ideal institutions, if I could, to perform all the service of my country. When I can not get the ideal thing spoken into law in a second of time, full armed, as Minerva was when she sprang from the brain of Jove, I will do the next best thing, and I will care for the unfortunate, hungry, and defenseless children by the best means at hand.

I do not care whether it is St. John's Orphanage or some other orphanage. Before they shall go cold and hungry, and unprotected and uncared for, I will even utilize that institution that believes in the divinity of Christ possibly from a little different standpoint than I believe. It is not a question of the divinity of Christ from any standpoint, so far as this appropriation is concerned. It is a question of relieving the suffering of those who are not so fortunate as your children and mine have been. It is a question (pending the time we build good orphan asylums) of using those to take care of those children who have the means to care for them.

Now, gentlemen may ask what legislation is desired. Before the gentleman's amendment can be safely enacted, legislation is desired that will clothe this board of children's guardians with power to take the half orphan, whose unfortunate parent, father or mother, can not support him, and instead of completely pauperizing that parent, who may be only temporarily embarrassed by allowing her children to be adjudicated paupers or vicious, that she may say, "Here is my misfortune. I can not care for my helpless child. I hope for employment in three months or six months. For God's sake take my child and care for it."

Ah, but, says my friend, the child can be adjudicated a pauper by the courts. But, gentlemen, I would relieve people in that way, when they ought to be relieved in that way. I sometimes give charity, but I never have given to an adult without fearing that I have contributed something to break down the manhood of that adult. You may say that is sentiment. But, gentlemen, character is builded upon sentiment, and when we lose our self-respect and feel that others have lost respect for us, we are in a pretty bad way.

Now, when you clothe this board of children's guardians with legislative power to in some measure throw its arms around this class of unfortunates, as the grace of God is thrown around the unfortunate from the standpoint of love, and forbearance, and sympathy, then I will vote with my friend; but until you give that legislative authority I am not here to say that I will turn out of these institutions any children because forsooth they have not been, or the parent or guardian does not desire them to be, adjudicated paupers or vicious under the law as it now stands.

Now, a word as to the merits of St. John's Orphanage. My friend from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER], it seems to me, in his criticism, was not quite as happy as I have heard him. He spoke of the millionaire communicants in this church, and mentioned the names of one or two on Saturday. Well, gentlemen, if I was running a church in the District of Columbia and had charitable work on hand, if I could reach out and bring into the charitable organizations of that church as rich a woman as Mrs. Hearst, I would do so. I would bring in everybody that I could.

Now, this institution is organized. It is an old church orphanage. My friends say that last year they paid $6,000 of their debt. Why, they have a private income. They had a bequest of $5,000 from Mr. Warder. Their parishioners contributed liberally, and I thank God they were able to do so. I did not contribute anything to this church orphanage, for I have my own little work to do in my own corner. But does my friend know what it costs the Government from the Treasury of the United States and the District of Columbia, how much per capita the Government contributed last year in this appropriation of $1,800? Just $20 per capita. In other words, for, in round numbers, 100 children in St. John's Church Orphanage that were cared for, and well cared for, the Government paid one-fifth, or $20 apiece.

Mr. WHEELER. Eighteen dollars, and last year $15.20.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. How does the gentleman know it did not go to the payment of that debt?

Mr. CANNON. My friend can not afford, after I again give him assurances that I have heretofore given, to play upon that string.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. If my friend will permit me again, I said every dollar for this orphanage was expended for its maintenance and for payment of some obligation of the institution. The gentleman seems to think that he has segregated that $1,800 given by the Government, but the facts are against him; that amount has simply gone into the general fund and into the expenditures, the legitimate expenditures, I admit, of the institution. That is plain.

Mr. CANNON. On the contrary. Five thousand dollars of this was a special bequest given to pay this debt. Sometimes it is said we believe in funerals, but this man who is dead and gone did well. I can not afford to have any question of fact between my friend and myself as to the accounting for the appropriations; and I here and now hold in my hand a complete set of blanks that covers the reports of these expenditures in detail.

Now, follow me again, for I measure my words and speak whereof I know after an investigation. There is a treasurer of St. John's Orphanage. He has not and can not draw one cent of the public money until he executes his bond as a disbursing officer of the United States. Then he can draw one quarter of the $1,800 for the first quarter of the year. Now, that $1,800 is expended for care and maintenance, every dollar and every cent of it, and there is an itemized account kept just as any other public expenditures are kept. That report of expenditures is first given to the superintendent of charities. It goes next from him to the District Commissioners. It goes from them to the District auditor. I am now speaking of the three months' expenditures. It goes from that auditor to the auditing officers of the Treasury for final auditing, just as all Government accounts do; and the three months' expenditures must be audited and approved before the requisition of the disbursing officer will be recognized, and the next three months' expenditures are advanced by the Government. And my friend admits in his argument that if I am correct in this statement that it takes from him the foundation substantially upon which he stood.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Oh, no; let there be no mistake about this.

Mr. CANNON. I do not want any misapprehension. I understand that to be my friend's position.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. If you can show that $1,800 was segregated, and that the $1,800 appropriated by the Government was expended for the maintenance of certain specific children who are specifically a public charge, then very much of the argument based upon the facts in this case will be taken away; but you can not do that, and do not pretend so to do. You simply say that these various amounts of money which came into the funds of the institution from various sources were paid out to meet the expenses of the institution. That is all.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I will admit that there is no question that it has been paid out to meet the expenses of the institution.

Mr. WHEELER. And for those who would be a public charge.

Mr. CANNON. I will not split hairs with my friend longer. I have stated three times the system of accounting.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am unable to see what relevancy or pertinency or force there is in the argument of the gentleman from Illinois which relates to the accountings or disbursing of this money. What I am interested in seeing is what we as Congressmen are called upon to do now, and I ask for information if this orphanage is a corporation?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is a sectarian corporation, a Catholic institution, is it not?

Mr. CANNON. It is an Episcopal institution. It is under the auspices of the Episcopal Church.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is what is known in common parlance as a sectarian institution. What we as Congressmen do find is this, that if we pass this bill as it now is we vote to appropriate $1,800 to a corporation organized under sectarian auspices for sectarian purposes. The matter of the number of auditings, the hands through which it goes, the matter as to the number of men who inspect the receipts and vouchers and accounts, do not signify. As I say, that does not touch the general question that by our votes we are asked to appropriate $1,800 of money to a sectarian corporation.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I am glad the gentleman has stated what he has, because it absolutely shows, after a man has studied the question to get at the facts for days, and then to the best of his feeble ability has tried to tell the facts, how poor he is in making the facts known when a gentleman so intelligent as the gentleman from Wisconsin arises and asks such a question as he has asked.

Now, to reply again in substance to him, the St. John's Orphanage Association, as I understand, is a corporation of many years' standing, under the patronage of the Episcopal Church. The people that are admitted there in pursuance of its organization are needy, those requiring nurture and the care of charitable persons in the absence of natural guardians having the ability to extend such care. Now, as the District of Columbia has not been provided, under law, with power to relieve these people, the Committee on Appropriations recommend this $1,800, as such sums have heretofore been recommended and appropriated, as a contribution toward the support of the 100 children in that refuge. But my friend [Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin] says he does not care anything about the accounting. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do, because this service is placed under an officer of the Government, duly appointed, confirmed by the Senate, duly sworn, and it is his duty, under the law, which I have before me, to know about the conduct of this institution and about the children that are in it. This money is drawn from the Treasury by a bonded officer of the United States, and, as proof that it is expended for the care and maintenance of those who would otherwise be hungry, and who are wards of this Government, the accounts are audited like other Government accounts.

Now, my friend says that he objects to this appropriation because it utilizes a sectarian institution, and from that I suppose that if he gets an opportunity he will vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska. Am I correct in that?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not know what the amendment is. I shall vote against the provision in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. The amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] strikes out all these items and puts the money under the control of the board of children's guardians.

Mr. GROUT. But that is not the pending motion.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; but that is the purpose the gentleman announces. Now, I say to my friend from Wisconsin that the very statute which he refers to makes it lawful for this board of children's guardians to utilize this and all other sectarian institutions; so my friend will see that, when it comes to voting upon either of these propositions, so far as he is concerned, he will have to be like the colored man and "take to the woods." [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. May I ask the gentleman a question? Is there any existing general provision of law for the care of orphan children in the District of Columbia?

Mr. CANNON. None except under these appropriation bills—except through the board of children's guardians.

Mr. RAY. And, as I understand, it has been the custom of Congress from year to year to make these appropriations?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. The gentleman from New York asks whether there is any provision of law. I desire to say that the board of children's guardians that I have been talking about is a Government board and has power, when children are committed to it by the courts, to maintain them.

Mr. RAY. But these children that are cared for by this orphanage association are not committed to the charge of the board of children's guardians?

Mr. CANNON. They are not.

Mr. WASHINGTON. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WASHINGTON. These children that are committed to this board of children's guardians, do you know in what institutions they are placed, whether in institutions in this District or elsewhere?

Mr. CANNON. In part to institutions in the District; in part to homes outside of the District; in part to deaf and dumb or insane institutions, in cases where the children are imbecile or need the care of such institutions.

Mr. WASHINGTON. That, I understand, is for the reason that the District has no institutions to which any of this class of children can be committed.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. WASHINGTON. And the children must therefore be committed to some charitable institution, either here or elsewhere?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. And that goes to the very core of this contention, the fact that, as to the great majority of children who are needy and ought to be cared for, there is no law under which they can be admitted to such institutions and no Government institutions to which they can be admitted. Now, pending the enactment of any such law, I say it would be cruelty to split hairs and say: "We will not do anything for these children because we are not ready to do something for them according to our exact views of propriety."

Mr. RAY. May I ask the gentleman one other question?
Mr. CANNON. Certainly.
Mr. RAY. As I understand it, these children who are cared for by this particular church are not exclusively children taken from the families or from the care of relatives of persons who belong to that church.
Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. It is God's poor that need relief and that obtain it there.
Mr. RAY. God's poor from all churches?
Mr. CANNON. Certainly.
Mr. RAY. Or perhaps from no church?
Mr. CANNON. Certainly.
Mr. WHEELER. The report itself states that expressly.
Mr. RAY. And, as I understand, no attention whatever is paid to the church to which the children or their parents belong, or with which they may be connected.
Mr. CANNON. Not the slightest on earth.
Mr. PITNEY. Are the board of children's guardians provided with any building or institution to which they may commit such poor?
Mr. CANNON. Not at all.
Mr. PITNEY. Is there any building or institution in the District of Columbia of a public nature in which the children of the poor may be cared for if these appropriations are struck out of the bill?
Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman mean under this jurisdiction?
Mr. PITNEY. Under public jurisdiction.
Mr. CANNON. None, except the Reform School and other institutions of that character of a quasi criminal nature.
Mr. PITNEY. Do you know whether those institutions are sufficient to care for all the children of the District needing care?
Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. They are taxed now to their utmost limit.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman speaks of the Government accounting officers.
Mr. CANNON. Yes; but my friend says he does not care anything about those.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not, for this reason——
Mr. CANNON. I will hear the gentleman's question.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has that Government accounting officer under the law, if this bill shall become a law in the form it now stands, any jurisdiction to withhold one penny of this fund from the conductors of this Episcopal institution, they telling him that they wanted to pay debts?
Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Where does he get that authority?
Mr. CANNON. Have I got to open a kindergarten here on Government accounting? [Laughter.]
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As I look at the matter, this House, in the provision now under discussion, makes a plain, direct appropriation of a specific sum, without conditions, subject to no authority or revision by any person or persons in or out of Government employ, to a sectarian corporation. This provision does not state the purposes for which the money is to be used nor the persons who are to direct how it shall be used nor the persons who are to receive it, but the money is given to a corporate association; the corporate officers draw it, and no Government officer has jurisdiction over it.
Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, of such criticism comes much of the opposition to this appropriation. I say again, that the whole field of law, so far as it applies to appropriations and accountings, is called into force in the expenditure of this money; and I commend the gentlemen to a study of the accounting system of the Government——
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.
Mr. CANNON. And if it is upon that question that the gentleman again desires to speak, I can not make it any plainer.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman cite the law which confers any authority upon any person, corporate or otherwise, to control the expenditure of this fund, except only the officers of this corporation who get this money by donation from the Government without any qualification whatever?
Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I before called my friend's attention (if he has done me the honor to listen to the earlier part of this debate) to the authority. That authority consists in part of the law creating the superintendent of charities and defining his duties touching these institutions, and of the order of the District Commissioners made under the law requiring the auditing, and the law requiring the final accounting. Now, that tells the whole story to a man who is versed in Government appropriation and accounting; and I can not say anything further about it.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman claim, because this sum of $1,800 must be used under the law he has read for the maintenance of this institution (the point I make is evaded), that this is a direct appropriation for sectarian purposes?
Mr. CANNON. I evade nothing. I say, measuring my words—and my friend must not ask me to stand here and take the time of this Committee of the Whole in making him understand Government accounting—I say again, measuring my words, that no dollar of this money can be drawn from the Treasury except by a disbursing officer, and that such officer can not settle his accounts until he has complied with the law in showing that every cent received by him has been applied for this purpose.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin again rose.
Mr. CANNON. I can not yield further to my friend upon this matter, because I should not feel justified in doing so.
Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?
Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.
Mr. POWERS. Can the gentleman inform the committee whether the expenditure of this appropriation will pass under the eye of Comptroller Bowler?
Mr. CANNON. Under the Dockery accounting system it is certain to pass under the eye of Comptroller Bowler, just as all other Government accounts do.
Mr. POWERS. Are we not, then, perfectly safe in regard to the expenditure of the appropriation? [Laughter.]
Mr. CANNON. That is what I have been trying to demonstrate.
Mr. POWERS. Let me ask the gentleman a further question—whether in his own State the legislature is accustomed to vote money to different church organizations for charitable purposes?
Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that in my State there are certain charities—those making provision for the insane, the deaf, and dumb, etc.—which are conducted in State institutions. But the poor are cared for by the respective county authorities—boards of supervisors, township officers, etc.; and they are in the habit, in some instances, of building institutions and officering them just as I should be glad to do, if we could, in this case. But if the authorities have not any place in which to care for those persons who need public care, they utilize any agency which may happen to exist, and which they can hire to take care of the poor that they can not otherwise take care of.
Mr. POWERS. I notice that in this bill general provision is made for the poor, the insane, the criminal——
Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.
Mr. POWERS. And in addition to that there are appropriations to specific church organizations by name.
Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.
Mr. POWERS. Now, my question is whether in the gentleman's State the legislature, after providing for the insane, the poor, and the criminal classes, goes a step further and takes upon the State the burden of appropriating money every year to those church organizations?
Mr. CANNON. In most of the counties, wherever it is necessary, we utilize whatever means are at hand to care for the poor when the county has not its own hospitals or asylums to do the work.
Mr. POWERS. I want the gentleman to get my question——
Mr. CANNON. I think I understand the gentleman's question.
Mr. POWERS. It is whether you appropriate specifically to church organizations?
Mr. CANNON. I will answer my friend's question. We appropriate specifically to pay any organization that will do the service if we are not prepared to do it ourselves. For instance, in my county of Vermilion we have been in the habit of sending the poor to the hospitals when they were entitled to relief, because as yet the county has no hospital of its own, and we do not fail to send them to a hospital because, perchance, the hospital is under the care or patronage of a church. And so I apprehend it is everywhere.
Mr. POWERS. Well, I apprehend it is not so, and that the general rule is quite the reverse of what the gentleman has stated.
But what I was getting at is this: What excuse have we for traveling a thousand miles and coming here to Washington and voting public money for purposes of this kind which we would not dare to do in our own State legislatures?
Mr. CANNON. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I would dare to vote for anything in my home that I would vote for here. Similar expenditures of money in my own county have been made where it was necessary to make them. And I will ask my friend from Vermont now, Representative as he is here, in the absence of the means to take care of helpless poor children, whether he will let them suffer and refuse to give them care if they can not get that care otherwise than by appropriating $20 per capita to be expended through this association?
Mr. POWERS. I would say in response to the inquiry of the gentleman that I would make the most liberal appropriations for all worthy persons and for all laudable purposes of this kind. But this bill appropriates double the money for that purpose that was ever appropriated heretofore in our own States per capita. It is the extravagance that I am protesting against, and not the principle involved.
I make no war upon any church or any combination of charitable people, but what I do protest against is the amount proposed

We should not appropriate a great deal more money than is necessary to appropriate to take care of these people.

Mr. CANNON. Well, as I understand my friend now, he does not object on the ground of principle, but merely questions whether this appropriation is necessary or not. I have no personal knowledge of the facts, not having been able to investigate for myself personally. But on the best inquiry we could make from all the public reports which came to us, it seems necessary that we should make this appropriation. We are peculiarly situated here in Washington, the gentleman should remember. This is the political center of the Government of the United States. There is a large colored population and many helpless people from all parts of the country who come in here, and I think that it is not extravagant when St. John's Church Orphanage in this city will take care of 100 poor children for $20 per capita per annum.

Now I have done. I have performed my duty as best I could. I have no pride in this bill. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, one of the servants of this House, I have a duty to perform. I have given you the results of my investigation as best I could, and what I believe to be the best interest of the public service here. Now, having given the result of my own investigation, if the House sees proper not to make the appropriation at all, well and good, so be it.

Mr. COLSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois how many of these institutions now in receipt of appropriations from the General Government are sectarian in their character?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I do not know what you mean by "sectarian."

Mr. COLSON. I think the gentleman well understands what the term means.

Mr. CANNON. Well, would you call the Woman's Christian Association sectarian?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That is not involved in the question at all.

Mr. COLSON. I am asking the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know what the gentleman means exactly. We have passed that item, and there is no question about that.

Mr. MORSE. I would like to answer the gentleman and tell him that it is not a sectarian institution.

Mr. CANNON. There are several of these institutions that we have already passed—there is the Woman's Christian Association, there is the National Homeopathic Hospital, the Washington Hospital for Foundlings, and so on. We are on page 38 of the bill, and let me say to the gentlemen that there are many charitable associations in this District that are caring for children without one cent of aid, but wholly by private subscription, and they are not referred to at all in this bill. But let me be frank with the gentleman. I would not appropriate one cent to any private institution, for the benefit of the institution, whether it be sectarian or otherwise. But until the Government builds orphan asylums of its own, which I favor, I would have any institution to care for the poor children of this District that will care for them, rather than let the children suffer.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DINGLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed joint resolution (H. Res. 88) authorizing the distribution of copies of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in Congressional districts where distribution has not been made.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be permitted to occupy a little more time than five minutes in this discussion.

Mr. BARRETT. I object.

Mr. SAYERS. I hope the gentleman will not do that. Time was given to that side, and certainly the same courtesy should be extended to this.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to have about fifteen minutes.

Mr. GROUT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have fifteen minutes.

Mr. MORSE. I am entirely content, if it is understood that the previous question is not to be moved.

Mr. GROUT. Oh, there is no previous question here in committee.

Mr. MORSE. Well, or the debate closed. I want five minutes myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from New York fifteen minutes?

Mr. KEM. I object.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire first to express my appreciation of the rare courtesy extended to me by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I believe.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. No, Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Since only five minutes have been accorded to me by this rare exhibition of courtesy, I must endeavor to condense my remarks and let them be embraced within the time limited.

Before proceeding to discuss the question before the House, I desire to call attention to a serious misrepresentation made in the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] on Saturday last. We can not, under our rules of procedure, always guard against the poisoned tongue of slander. An ordinary attack I should pay no attention to, but when a gross misstatement is made, I feel bound to notice it.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] said:

> The gentleman from New York, however, by his vote and advice, as well as by his actions, which speak louder than words, would send to the poorhouse every old soldier in the land that he possibly could, unless outvoted by the patriotic majority in this House.

This statement, Mr. Chairman, I pronounce to be absolutely and unqualifiedly untrue, and I say that no basis can be found for such a statement in any speech ever made by me on this floor. In the pension debate there were two questions argued. One was purely an administrative question, the question whether the power should be taken away from the Commissioner of Pensions to suspend a pension in case of fraud, and whether that power should be vested in the United States district or circuit courts. That was the first question. Was there any question of poorhouse involved in that?

The other was whether the pension rolls should be enlarged so as to admit widows with an income of $500 per annum. Was there any question of the poorhouse involved in that?

And so I say that any such statement as that which was made the other day must have been conceived in wanton malevolence, and therefore should be noticed.

Now let us see what is the question before the committee. The question is whether this appropriation for the Church Orphanage of St. John's Parish should be stricken out. It is somewhat difficult to follow the trend of the views and of the argument of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER]. On Saturday last he told you he was against all governmental aid, against all State aid, to charity. Then, having made a motion against the Temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers, he abandoned and withdrew that motion, and then struck a blow at the destitute children of the District.

Now he comes in and tells us that he abandons the position taken by him on Saturday last—that is, the position that there should be no governmental aid—but that he is in favor of giving all this money, all this fund, to a quasi police board, this board of children's guardians—a board of special jurisdiction, not of general jurisdiction, deriving its powers from arraignment before a magistrate; because that is the basis and the foundation of its authority. The child must be arraigned before the police court, and can only be consigned to the care of this board by order of a judge of the police court or of the criminal court of this District. His proposition is that we give to this board, which, under existing law, has no authority whatever to receive one dollar of the money—that we give all the funds to it and delegate the power of distribution vested in the Congress of the United States to this board, appointed by justices of a police court; in other words, instead of being the almoners of our own charity, that we delegate it to an insignificant local board—a board eager to take all power away from other charities just as worthy and to aggregate all power over this fund in its own hands.

Gentlemen, I say to you this is not sound. If I had been accorded five or ten minutes more, if I had not been deprived by the rare courtesy and good breeding of a gentleman of this House from exercising that privilege, I should have endeavored to enlighten the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the gentleman have an extension of time.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request?

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] have five minutes more time.

Mr. KEM. I object.

Mr. BARRETT. I should be glad to interpose no objection, if the gentleman will allow me one moment to reply to his statement in reference to myself.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KEM].

Mr. GROUT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] for a minute.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York has alluded to my attitude in regard to the extension of his time, which he regards as discourteous and is pleased to call a sample of impoliteness extended to him. I wish to say to the gentleman that I objected to the extension of his time simply for the purpose of bringing him to a realizing sense that courtesy is not entirely a monopoly of one member, but should be shared by all alike. On the 16th day of January, 1896, the gentleman from New York, the House being in Committee of the Whole on the pension bill, rose and had read, or he read himself, a letter from an anonymous correspondent which was a practical insult to every member of this House, alluding to the House as a "half acre of demagogues." I arose at the time, my attention having been temporarily diverted, having heard a few words from the letter, to ask him to allow that letter to be read again, in order that the House might have a full appreciation of his discourtesy in the deliberate reflection which he had made through an anonymous letter upon the intelligence and patriotism of the members of this House. The gentleman refused to yield, and therefore I objected to any courtesy being extended to him to-day, in the hope that he would learn to appreciate that other members of the House were entitled to the courtesy which he invoked for himself.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Am I to have my five minutes now?

The CHAIRMAN. Objection was made.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I think you will bear me out in the view——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Vermont yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GROUT. Yes, sir; for that purpose.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I think the members of this committee on either side of the aisle, on both sides of the House, will agree with me that I endeavored during a running debate of a week on the pension question to answer every member with courtesy and to give to every member on either side of the House all the chance he could desire. If I failed to afford a chance to interrupt me to the gentleman from Massachusetts it was probably because I had been interrupted four or five times within as many minutes and was endeavoring to preserve the continuity of my thought and to have some symmetry in the line of my argument. I need hardly say that it would be very far from my intention to treat any gentleman representing the State of which I have the honor to be a native with any discourtesy.

Now, to proceed to the consideration of this question of law. As lawyers, it will be necessary for the members of this committee to consider but three statutes. The first is the law of February 13, 1885, which gave to the magistrates in this District power to commit any child who had been subjected to cruel treatment or willful abuse to an orphan asylum or charitable institution. This act is referred to in the act of 1892, to which the existing power of the board of children's guardians owes its existence. The act of 1892 created the board of children's guardians, and it further gave the board jurisdiction over what? Over children who had been committed by reason of the provisions of section 2 of the act of 1885, and over certain other children. That is to say, over all children who are destitute of suitable homes and adequate means, all children abandoned by their parents or guardians, all children kept in vicious or immoral associations. When? Whenever—that is the contingency for which the act provides—"such children may be committed to the care of the board by the police court or the criminal court of the District."

That is, the jurisdictional power is found in their committal by the magistrates. Now, it is manifest, when you consider these two acts—the act of 1885 and the act of 1892, the law of 1892, which created the board of children's guardians, and is the act which may be termed its charter—and when you consider the further fact that in the last section of that act of 1892 the general power of supervision is given to the superintendent of charities over the board of children's guardians, you will see that it was the intention of the lawmaking power to limit the jurisdiction and power of the board of children's guardians, to limit its jurisdiction to the exercise of power only over children committed by the magistrates, and not to give general jurisdiction or exercise of power over all destitute children within the District of Columbia.

On the other hand, if you will examine the appropriation act of 1890, which remains the existing law to-day, you will find that the superintendent of charities of the District, an officer appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, has general power over all charities of the District of Columbia. You are asked now, by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER], to take away that power from the superintendent of charities, appointed by the Executive, and confer it solely on the board of guardians, appointed by the judges of the police courts, and to give that board control over all the funds now parceled out through the exercise of our wise discretion among all these various charities.

It would be a mistake. It would be a grave error in legislation to make this change without due consideration and due advisement. From another point of view it would be an equally great error on the merits. I believe that this association connected with the parish of St. John is a most worthy and excellent institution. Out of all the funds which are required for its support only a paltry contribution of $1,800 is asked from the Government——

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, it will not, I think, be violative of the confidence of the Committee on Appropriations to say that on the subject of these private charities, many of which, as we have learned, are sectarian, the members of the committee were not entirely agreed. This has already been made apparent by the motion and by the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] who is a member of the committee.

This question was, of course, fully considered in the committee, and when, on the final vote, I found myself in the minority and it was proposed to authorize me to report this bill to the House, I suggested that it might perhaps be better to select some one to bring in the bill who could support every provision in it, stating that, for myself, my position in the committee would be my position in the House. That suggestion, however, was not accepted, and I brought this bill in here upon the order of the committee, with all points as to individual conviction and individual action distinctly reserved.

Now, in behalf of the committee, let me say they gave this question long and patient consideration in a session which ran well into the night, and a majority thought it best—although I feel justified in saying that not a single member of the majority was entirely satisfied—the majority thought it best to bring the bill into the House with the provisions which are found in it, the same provisions that have been found in the District appropriation bill for years past, except that there is an addition of four new institutions calling for an additional appropriation, in the aggregate, of $5,000. Those four additional appropriations will be found on page 39 of the bill.

The majority of the committee, I say, thought it best to report the bill in this form, and under ordinary circumstances I would have subordinated my judgment to the judgment of the committee, because I can not say that it was wholly without reason. There were really certain reasons for it, some of which have been stated by the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the committee [Mr. CANNON]; reasons growing out of the peculiar nature of the charities in this District, which are anomalous and quite unlike those in other large cities.

But, Mr. Chairman, I felt then and I feel now that this question involves more than mere detail in administration, more than the necessities or convenience of the local situation. My objection to appropriating public money for these private institutions may be briefly stated under two heads. First, as they are purely private institutions, the Government has no power—mark what I say—the Government has no power to visit, inspect, and supervise them or their expenditure of this money, none whatever. I am not unmindful of the act creating the office of superintendent of charities for the District, or of the fact that Congress has undertaken to confer on that officer the right to visit these institutions, to audit their accounts, and so on; but these institutions are corporations, every one of them.

It is true they permit the superintendent of charities to go and inspect them and to report upon them, but he can not do it as a matter of legal right. It is simply permissive. On that point I refer, gentlemen, to the famous Dartmouth College decision in which this principle was established under the advocacy of the great Webster. I say, upon authority of that decision these institutions are not subject to public visitation and inspection. It is a matter of sufferance. Let some question arise in St. Ann's Infant Asylum, for instance—there is such an institution—or, say, in the St. John's Orphanage—for that is the one that is now before us for consideration—some scandal, or some question involving points of moral or religious instruction——

Mr. GROUT. I should like to have five minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I hope my colleague will be allowed the additional time he desires.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GROUT. Suppose, I say, that some question should arise in one of these institutions on some point of moral or religious instruction in some time of great public excitement, which the institution did not want looked into, they would have a right to close their doors in the face of the superintendent of charities and of every other comer, and to say to them, "Gentlemen, betake yourselves into the street." That would be their legal right. There is no question whatever about it. Mark you, I am speaking only of their legal right, for, as a matter of fact, they permit inspection now.

Then there is also the question of accounting, which has been referred to and elaborately explained by my friend from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Now, let us see about that. In this appropriation, which is for "maintenance," it would undoubtedly be the duty of the accounting officers to have some account submitted which would show that the money here appropriated was expended for maintenance. The gentleman told us that he had vouchers here and forms on which the reports of these institutions were made. I have gone through the list, and the only one I find containing any items, all the others being blank pieces of paper, is the one that I hold in my hand, and the items are: "Rent, salaries, all other items of maintenance, including repairs," "Permanent improvements, including purchase of real estate, interest, principal of debt." These are all the items. Now, what do we learn from this report about the expenditure of the money which we appropriate here?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not a thing.

Mr. GROUT. Not a thing, as the gentleman on my right remarks. These reports do not disclose how much of this money goes for the purchase of testaments in Latin, or Greek, or Hebrew, or how much may perchance go for the purchase of beads and crucifixes—because those are articles used in these institutions—not, perhaps, in the one we are now speaking of particularly, St. John's Orphanage, but certainly in those belonging to the Roman Church. These reports, I say, give us no information as to how this money is expended in detail.

Mr. MORSE. I will say to the gentleman from Vermont that in one of these institutions $1,200 was spent for rum.

Mr. GROUT. Well, let me say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that such a statement is liable to be misunderstood, because in the hospitals liquors are used as stimulants for patients, and all of us, including those who believe and practice temperance, believe that such things may be properly done.

Mr. MORSE. But let me tell my friend that the medical attendance is a separate item.

Mr. GROUT. Now, I ask, Mr. Chairman, if this is a proper and suitable appropriation for us to make. Has it upon it proper limitations? Is it a business-like affair? I say no. In passing, I have alluded to the sectarian character of these institutions, and herein lies the second reason why I can not vote for this appropriation. I wish to say I am not a member of the American—"Patriotic," a friend near me suggests—or "Protective" or "Protestant" Association, whatever the name may be. In fact, I know so little about the organization that I do not know the exact word that the "P" stands for. It may stand for every one of the words I have mentioned. All of them are good words. I am not a member of this American organization, but I am an American, and I am also a citizen of the State of Vermont.

Mr. GROUT. I trust I may have additional time. I find I can not present this matter as soon as I had hoped.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask that the gentleman from Vermont have sufficient time to finish his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I say I am a citizen of the State of Vermont, whose people in 1777—mark that early day—in 1777, at a time when most of the colonies were still existing under their charters from the Crown, and at a time, too, when in every one of the New England colonies except Rhode Island there was such a close union between church and state as to make it uncertain whether the church was the state or the state was the church—I say at that early time, and in the midst of the ideas prevailing more than a hundred years ago, the people of Vermont wrote in their constitution right underneath that famous provision prohibiting, absolutely, human slavery, which, by the way, was the first constitutional prohibition of slavery in the history of the world—I say they wrote an absolute prohibition of the union of church and state and declared for a complete and perfect separation of them as the surest means of preserving the liberty of both.

That provision is in the constitution to-day; and from the day of its adoption until now not a dollar of public money in that State has ever been appropriated to any sectarian use, or, to speak more liberally, in behalf of any religious enterprise whatever. And, gentlemen, I am ready to predict that the day is far distant—indeed, I assert that the day will never come—when among those green hills any different principle will prevail.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. GROUT. Why, sir, a proposition in the Vermont legislature for an appropriation of money from the public treasury to a church or a subordinate organization of a church or any religious organization whatever, in aid of its charities or its educational work, would be looked upon by the people of Vermont with equal astonishment and alarm, as subversive of one of the most important of the fundamental principles on which the State was built. But this is the precise proposition contained in this appropriation. Mr. Chairman, I can not vote for this appropriation and be true to the noble history and the grand traditions of the independent little State from which I come—the very birthplace and the home of the free church and the free school. I can not vote for it without contravening the express letter of its constitution as well as the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, which forbids all legislation "respecting an establishment of religion." I shall accordingly vote to strike it from the bill.

Now, this St. John's Orphanage Association is a magnificent charity. Let no one hesitate to believe that it is doing glorious work among the children of the District of Columbia, as undoubtedly, in their respective lines, these other institutions named a little further along in the bill are also doing. The St. Ann's Asylum, these industrial schools, and all these other charities are performing a noble work. God bless them! Their existence, Mr. Chairman, does not depend upon these appropriations. When it is claimed that it does, the charitable and philanthropic purposes of the people of the District of Columbia and of this whole country are, in my opinion, poorly understood.

Now, a word about this particular institution. We find by their annual report that they are by no means poor. They are really in a very good financial condition. This report discloses an endowment fund amounting to $18,900, with notes beginning with one from Abraham Fardon for $1,000, another for $1,000 from another person, one for $2,500, and so on, making up this endowment fund of $18,900. This is a charity, then, which does not depend on appropriations from Congress. It would no doubt gladly accept this appropriation, for it would unquestionably help the institution to prosecute the charitable work in which it is engaged. But it will find that the public hand, the hands of individuals, will be open to all the necessities of this institution. So also will it be found as to all these other institutions.

I have spoken of two kinds of institutions the appropriations for which are, to my mind, objectionable. First, private institutions, over which the Government has no control—institutions simply private. These are 19 in number, including those of a sectarian character. There are, as I am informed (and I believe my information is correct), 6 of the 19 of a sectarian character, beginning with the Church Orphanage Association, which we are now considering, and including the St. Ann's Infant Asylum, the Association for Works of Mercy, the House of the Good Shepherd, the St. Rose's Industrial School, and the St. Joseph's Asylum—6 in all.

For the reasons already given, Mr. Chairman, under no circumstances can I vote for these sectarian appropriations. I must stand upon the doctrine taught me among the hills of Vermont, and must protest against them always.

As to the other private appropriations for the remaining thirteen institutions, I think, after a careful study of the subject, that I can suggest a practical method of solution. Confessedly they are nonsectarian in their character, and they embrace all shades of religious belief and are not open to the objections which have been urged against those to which I have referred, and I offer as a part of my remarks, which in due time I will offer as a concluding paragraph to the bill, that which I send to the Chair, and will briefly explain it after it has been read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no part of any money appropriated by this act for charities or charitable institutions shall be paid to any institution named in this act until the charter or articles of incorporation thereof shall be so amended as to accord to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or to their designated agents, authority to visit and inspect such institutions, and to control and supervise the expenditure therein of all public funds paid out of appropriations made by Congress.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, that amendment really explains itself. My programme is this: Strike out every one of these sectarian institutions, and do it squarely on the ground that we can not consistently appropriate money to such establishments.

This provides that no money shall be paid to any of these thirteen nonsectarian institutions till they so amend their acts of incorporation or articles of association as to admit public visitation, inspection, and supervision. In other words, the Government keeps its hand on the money which it appropriates until the institutions grant the power of inspection; and it seems to me in all respects to be a perfectly safe and satisfactory method of dealing with the subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word more, and I think I can explain satisfactorily to the committee the attitude of my friend from Nebraska. I did not know that he intended to propose the amendment as a part of his remarks, or I would have conferred with him in advance as to the plan proposed by me. But it can ultimately be offered, and the amendment that I have offered be acted upon also as a substitute; or he can, if he chooses, withdraw his amendment altogether, for I shall insist upon a vote in the committee on the amendment I have offered.

It is true, in disposition of this matter in the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Nebraska and myself stood together in support of substantially his first amendment. But on a more careful examination of the matter I am satisfied it is open to objection.

It will not, for instance, work well with the Destitute Colored Women and Children's Home, which was established by the United States Government, although it is really a private institution. It is almost wholly dependent on the Government for support, and the Government should not fail to provide for it unless it is willing to have it closed.

As to the board of children's guardians, to which attention was paid in the committee, it is not a private organization; it is organized by act of Congress, but the officers do not have succession. The trustees and managers are appointed by the two police judges of the criminal court and the judge of the District court, and they may be removed by the same authority.

This is a public institution, and I first thought it might be utilized in the solution of this problem, but it must be admitted that it is open to some of the objections urged by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The amendment which I will offer when the time comes will, I think, work a solution of this whole question, provided the committee are willing to stand with me, first, in saying that to no sectarian institution shall we appropriate money at all under any circumstances, Government inspection or not; and then that as to all these other private institutions, we will let them go on as heretofore, provided they will open themselves to inspection and superintendence, as provided by the amendment.

I do not think of anything more that I wish to say in this connection.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, not only in this Congress, but heretofore, when this matter has been considered carefully, for a number of years, I desire, so far as I am able, to give reasons why I think the policy which the Committee on Appropriations has adopted should be carried out.

I hope I may not be guilty of divulging any of the secrets of the committee when I state that the fight upon this appropriation only began at a late hour on the night before this bill was reported. We had been considering this bill for several weeks. Finally, on the very night before we were to report it to the House, when we were considering it for the last time, there appeared before that committee an organization known, I believe, as the A. P. A., which began an attack upon these appropriations, for the reason, as they conceived, that they were made to sectarian institutions. Up to that time I believe there were no dissensions in the committee, but at that point these gentlemen saw fit to begin an attack.

Now, I want to say, if the object of this appropriation is real charity, if it is to aid the weak, the needy, and the unfortunate, the little parentless child and the old decrepit man and woman, that these institutions are the best channels through which we can arrive at that conclusion, the best method of dispensing charity in this District.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that appropriations should be made directly to sectarian institutions for sectarian purposes, and I maintain and hold that these appropriations contained in this bill are not for such purposes. The appropriations which are made by the bill are merely supplemental, in some instances one-quarter of the amount which these charitable institutions dispense. Many of them are almost entirely supported by the charity of good people in this District and in the country at large. So far as I know, and I have been able to look personally into the workings of some of these institutions—so far as I know, there is absolutely no attempt on the part of these institutions to carry out the work of charity in a sectarian way.

Unless we are ready here now to make appropriations for constructing buildings all over this District, unless we are ready to embark in the expenditure of half a million or a million of dollars for the purpose of charity, then, from the standpoint of economy, if nothing else, I believe we should adhere to the old-time principle of this appropriation.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that these institutions furnish to charity more than this Congress appropriates for that purpose. I know that, because of their existence, many of the good people of this District are willing to place in their hands for distribution an amount of money much larger than that which we give. Now, what are the reasons for this appropriation? Charity, it is said. If it be charity, all that we are asked to do is to supplement and assist these institutions in carrying it out, to the greatest degree possible, with the limited amount appropriated.

It has been said that these institutions are not required to report to anyone. Gentlemen can look at the report of the superintendent in charge of charities in this District and they will find that nearly all of them have given to that officer a full and complete account of their expenditures.

I want to say that I am perfectly willing to vote for an amendment which will require that these institutions shall make a report of their financial disbursements to an officer of this Government, if necessary, but I am not willing to admit that simply because an institution is organized under the name of any particular sect the principles of that sect are carried out in the dispensing of charity.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHEELER and Mr. MORSE addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] is recognized.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I can define my position in regard to these charitable societies in the District of Columbia in a few sentences. I am in favor of continuing the Government appropriation of money to such of these organizations and charities as are nonsectarian in their character, and quite a number of them are of that character—the Temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers and Sailors, the Hope and Help Mission for Fallen Women, which is doing a great and noble work in this city, etc.

To cut off the Government appropriation from such charities would be cruel and uncalled for. This city has a large number of these unfortunate persons to whom these societies afford at least temporary relief.

Many of these societies, those I have mentioned and others, like the Central Union Mission, ask no questions about a man's nationality, creed, or religion, and are supported by Christian people of all denominations. Many of these poor and unfortunate people come from remote sections to this city looking for an office or work in some Government Department.

They are not successful, as there are such positions for only a fraction of the people who seek them. It would be manifestly unjust and unfair to throw all this expense on the charitable people of this city.

Now, on the other hand, there are some of these institutions that are purely religious and sectarian in their character. And it is manifestly contrary to the genius and spirit of our Government to appropriate public money for the support of sectarian institutions, and there are several appropriations of public money for such institutions in this bill.

I say it violates the principle on which this Government was founded—i. e., an entire divorce of church and state—for the Government to appropriate public money for the sectarian schools or charitable institutions.

One of these charities—the one now under consideration—is an Episcopal charity, another is a Lutheran, and quite a number of them are Catholic. I will vote against every one of those items in this bill.

Now, as an illustration of several of the nonsectarian charities for which I shall be glad to vote to continue Government aid, I call attention to the "Hope and Help Mission," whose report will be found on page 298, to the superintendent of charities of the District of Columbia.

This is an entirely nonsectarian charitable society, the officers of which belong to many different Protestant denominations in this city, and I believe that it is doing a great and good work among the fallen women in this city. It maintains a home in this city for their reformation. As its name implies, it opens a "door of hope" to these unfortunate people.

It is presided over by some of the first ladies in this city. Large public meetings have been held in the interests of this work, one of which I attended in the Congregational church.

The Star of this city recently described a visit of some of these ladies to some of the disreputable houses in this city and their successful efforts to induce some of the unfortunate inmates to abandon their wicked life and enter this door of hope.

I ask the Clerk to read the portion which I have marked, and I certainly hope only the sectarian and none of the nonsectarian appropriations like this will be stricken from the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Our beneficiaries are largely women who are broken in health and unable to earn their own living by any employment which could be secured for them under the circumstances. Many of them have been betrayed, and going from us in due time to the city hospitals have become mothers. We have again cared for them after confinement, with their children, until we could secure homes for them or send them back to friends in the city or adjacent States. Others have been led to abandon vicious lives, and have been converted to new and better ways of living through the motherly advice and counsel of the ladies of the board through faith and prayer.

All have willingly taken part in the general work of the home, and it is the veriest exception where one has not been deeply grateful for the help she has received.

Many worthy but destitute women have been sheltered at the home for days or months, and the usefulness of the home has been thus largely increased, while the demand upon it is greater.

We ask for a larger appropriation next year, feeling that we should secure a larger building, as the drain upon our charity is far greater than ever before. We ask the Commissioners to aid us in securing such an appropriation.

We, the board of managers of the mission, appeal for a direct appropriation from Congress of $1,000 in lieu of the $500 now received from the poor fund of the District, the latter being entirely inadequate for the needs of the work. We feel fully justified in making this appeal by the practical benefits which are being derived by the city from this work.

As to statistics, in addition to the large number of meals and lodgings already enumerated and of a temporal nature, we can testify that at least 14 women and girls have been clearly converted and fully redeemed from sinful lives during the past six months, and the aggregate for the year is at least 25. Our board, which is nonsectarian, is composed of Mr. James T. Petty and Mr. Thomas Jarvis, of the Southern Methodist Church; Mrs. Mary E. Catlin, of the First Congregational Church; Mrs. L. D. Luckett, of the Metropolitan Presbyterian Church; Mrs. E. K. Knowles, of Vermont Avenue Christian Church; Mrs. M. M. Mitchell, of Waugn Methodist Episcopal Church, and Miss Mary Rector and Mrs. S. D. La Fétra, of the Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church. All of these are actively engaged in systematic work in their own churches, and all testify to the statement that this work pays as good a percentage in practical results as any other work they do for humanity.

The rule of the mission is to enable the mothers to be true to their children, for it is believed this is a strong factor in the redemption of the woman. It gives them a strong motive to try to redeem the past, that the innocent victims of their fall may not also be the sufferers for their guilt. We plead for this appropriation because we desire to open a nursery, well-heated, lighted, and well ventilated, where we can have competent nurses and proper food, and where these mothers may leave their children when they go out to service to earn an honest living. We want to "make it easy to do right and hard to do wrong," if possible.

Respectfully submitted.

SARAH D. LA FÉTRA,
President Board of Managers.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to close debate if I can upon this subject. I find that that is the general feeling.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to have five minutes. This side of the House has had very little time.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I would like to have a few minutes.

Mr. BOWERS. I want about two minutes.

Mr. GROUT. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and pending amendment be limited to twenty minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, when in my speech last Saturday I presented figures in order to compare the expense of maintaining by the board of children's guardians with the expense to the Government of the orphans' cared for by St. John's Parish Association, it was done without any intention to criticise the board of children's guardians, for whom I have the most profound respect, but it was simply to illustrate; for the figures given us by the reports of that board show that if the beneficiaries in St. John's Asylum should be taken therefrom and the extra expense of their maintenance cast upon the District of Columbia, it would tax the Government about $157.01 for each child, and the necessary appropriation to maintain these children would be $15,000 instead of only $1,800, and the appropriation for the ten institutions would be $157,112.73, instead of $30,800, as proposed by this bill, and the figures were cited simply to show that these institutions contributed four-fifths, and in some cases even more than four-fifths, of the amount which it really costs to support the orphans and other unfortunates committed to their care.

Certainly no one will question but that the bill as it now stands is in the strict line of economy. The St. John's Orphanage is educating, clothing, feeding, and sheltering from 95 to 115 children, every dollar of the expense being met by the charitable people except $18 per year for each child. Now, the letter which the gentleman from Nebraska had read from that excellent lady, Mrs. MacFarland, the vice-president of the board, shows that the very minimum cost of the board of children whose expenses are paid by the board is $96 per capita; and it also shows that children who are bound out or adopted in families and are entirely supported by those families cost $12.71 per annum for the expenses of the agents who merely visit and supervise them. Therefore it will be seen that the cost to the Government simply for visiting and supervising the children who are bound out, and for their labor are being entirely supported and clothed, is almost as great as the total expense of the Government for the children in St. John's Orphange.

These orphans are visited and supervised by the best ladies of this city who receive no compensation whatever, but are only too glad to do this Christian work, while I observe that the board of children's guardians pay an agent a salary of $1,800. This is no doubt wise and necessary, as this board work in a very different sphere from the one occupied by the managers of the St. John Asylum.

Now, another thing to be considered is that these charitable associations are already the owners and in possession of costly buildings for sheltering these children. If all the beneficiaries of these institutions were dependent on the District of Columbia and appropriations from Congress, we would be compelled to appropriate a sum of not less than $500,000 to erect the necessary buildings. Therefore, we find ourselves confronted with this situation. Compelled as we are to provide for the feeble, the insane, the orphans, and other unfortunates, we are confronted with the question of how best to do it. We see these good women and good men contributing their money toward expenses which would otherwise devolve upon the District of Columbia, and all they ask is that this little supplemental appropriation of $30,000 should be made for a cause which would otherwise cost the Government at least $500,000.

There is another phase of this question which we must consider.

The report of the superintendent of charities and all the evidence before us show that the board of children's guardians is not provided with facilities for taking care of the children who are now inmates of the charitable institutions.

Section 2 of the bill which creates this board says:

That the members of the board of children's guardians shall be appointed by the judges of the police court and the judge holding the criminal court of the District of Columbia, met together for that purpose.

Section 4 states the character of children which under the law can be committed to this board. This section is as follows:

That said board shall have the care and supervision of the following classes of children: First. All children committed under section 2 of the act approved February 13, 1885, entitled "An act for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes." Second. All children who are destitute of suitable homes and adequate means of earning an honest living, all children abandoned by their parents or guardians, all children of habitually drunken or vicious or unfit parents, all children habitually begging on the streets or from door to door, all children kept in vicious or immoral associations, all children known by their language or life to be vicious or incorrigible whenever such children may be committed to the care of the board by the police court or the criminal court of the District; and power is hereby given to these courts to commit such children when not over 16 years of age to said board: Provided, That the laws regulating the commitment of children to the reform schools of the District shall not be deemed to be repealed in any part by this act. Third. Such children as the board of trustees of the reform school for boys or the reform school for girls may, in their discretion, commit to the board of children's guardians, and power is hereby given the board of trustees of the said reform school to commit any inmate of their respective institutions to the said board of guardians, conditionally upon the good behavior of the child so committed. Fourth. Under the rules to be established by the board children may be received and temporarily cared for pending investigation or judgment of the court.

It will be seen that the children which the law proposes to place under the care of the board are all or nearly all of that class which are brought to the attention of the public by the criminal courts. Page 269 of the Report of Reformatory Institutions shows us that even this class shrink from being placed under the board under any of the heads such as "Children abandoned by their parents," "Children of habitually drunken parents," "Children habitually begging on the streets," "Children kept in vicious or immoral associations," "Children known by their language or life to be vicious," "Children known to be incorrigible," and yet these are the character of children that seemed to be considered when the board of children's guardians was created.

I most earnestly protest that we should not place the children of St. John's Orphanage, or any of them, in association with the class of children referred to in the act creating the board of children's guardians, and yet the gentleman wishes to invade the homes of St. John's Orphan Asylum and take out these children and put them, or at least classify them, with those children that are sent to the board by the police court for the various reasons which have been read to you in this debate. Do not, I pray you, associate the children of the charitable societies of this city with the class mentioned in the law to which reference has been made in this debate.

The children cared for by the charitable societies are not what are designated as a reformatory class. Many and probably most of them were taken in tender years, and anything that is not good and pure is utterly unknown to them. Some of them have become orphans by the death of good and refined parents. In this city clerks and other employees of the Government live up to their salaries, and if they die in this city their children are often left without any means of support. It is often that such tender charges fall into the hands of the St. John's and similar associations.

The ladies devote themselves to the elevation of these little children. These societies and associations have one sphere of duty, and the board of children's guardians have quite another. The former take tender children and raise them to useful womanhood and manhood. The latter, by the very terms of the law to which they owe their existence, have a duty which must very largely be devoted to reforming those who have become victims of bad associations, or have been abandoned by intemperate parents, or those who have become destitute of suitable homes, or those who are before the courts, or those sent to the board by the Reform School.

The important duties of the board of children's guardians can not be too highly estimated. Their duties are of the greatest importance, and I believe the personnel of the board is all that could possibly be desired. No doubt the good they accomplish is very great, but my contention is that we should not without great necessity mix the children being reformed by them with the children who are being raised and educated by the St. John's and other similar asylums.

The gentleman who is pressing the amendments admits that the board of children's guardians are not provided with building or other facilities to care for children.

These are a few of the reasons why the law should stand as it has stood for many years.

There is another assertion by the gentleman from Nebraska to which I desire to call attention. He said that Congress had never appropriated money unless it was to be disbursed by an officer of the Government. He is greatly mistaken about that. Congress has often appropriated money to be expended in infected districts and places that were flooded where there was no disbursing officer; but it simply went to the mayors or other officials of the cities, and no question was ever asked as to what was done with the money.

I will also inform the gentleman that the Senate has passed a bill three separate times, each time appropriating $100,000,000 to aid in education in the States, and those bills provided that the money should be sent to the educational officers of those States, who were authorized to disburse it without any Federal supervision whatever, the only requirement being that the State officials should report to the Secretary of the Interior how the money was expended; and bills of a very similar character have passed this House; one such bill, I believe, as late as the Fifty-first Congress.

Here the various associations which receive these small pittances of $1,000 or $1,800, etc., from the Government make detailed reports not only of how they spend it, but they go further and itemize their expenses. The gentleman from Vermont sent an amendment to the Clerk's desk which prohibited giving any money to any institution which was sectarian in its character. He said he did this because the Constitution of the United States prohibited legislation upon religion. I insist that this bill does not legislate upon religion, it is peculiarly exempt from any such objection, but I insist that his proposed amendment does legislate upon religion, and if adopted will be in direct violation of the Constitution.

The words of the Constitution are:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

I insist that the proposed amendment does seek to prohibit the free exercise of religion.

It proposes to require charitable institutions to refrain from teaching religion in order to avail themselves of an appropriation to take care of poor orphans.

When you ask this St. John's Orphanage what it has done with this money they point to the fact that they have an average of 95 and sometimes 115 children, who are receiving the very best care and the best support and good education, and to aid in this work the association only receives $18 per capita from the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the appropriation of all the money necessary for charities in this District, but I am opposed to this Congress appropriating money to sectarian institutions. Now I want to caution the members right here, Mr. Chairman, that there is no proposition to reduce this appropriation. I understand the proposition of those who are opposing this plan is that this money shall be disbursed by an officer appointed by Congress, the body which rules this District. You have no more right to appropriate this money for the various sectarian institutions here than you have to appropriate it for St. John's Guild in the town in which I live, which maintains an orphanage and home for poor people. You have no more right, I say, to appropriate the money contemplated here in this District than you have in my town. The question is, whether you shall appropriate money to sectarian purposes over which we have no control, where you do not know where the money goes or what is to be done with it; but if we do make any appropriations, they ought to be under the control of our own officers.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me for a moment.

Mr. BOWERS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. You would not do me an intentional injustice?

Mr. BOWERS. Certainly not.

Mr. CANNON. I say that there is no such danger. The committee does not propose any such thing.

Mr. BOWERS. You have named on page 38 the sectarian institutions to which these appropriations are to be made, have you not? They are named right there, and the expenditures for these sectarian institutions are set out there. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, it is dangerous to enter upon that line of business. It is forbidden by the Constitution; it only leads to trouble; it is only the beginning, the entering wedge, of trouble. We must keep church and state apart. The churches have their privileges, all of them, to go on and do as they see fit, but let them keep their hands off the Government. We are here simply to legislate for the people, not to appropriate money to sectarian institutions. When you do that you open a Pandora's box, and no man can tell the evils that will come out of that box when you do open it. I say again, that we, all of us, are willing to appropriate money for our own people here. The poor of this District are under the care of Congress, because we are the guardians and the governors of this District, but the money we appropriate should be distributed by officers appointed or authorized by Congress.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I am a firm believer in the principle that there should be no union between church and state, nor indeed any partnership between them in the expenditure of public money for any purpose whatsoever, so far as it is possible to prevent it. Sir, the present relation existing between the charitable institutions in the District of Columbia and the Government, it is but just to say, has been in vogue for some years and has grown out of the fact that there are in the District no public charitable institutions of the kind named in this bill in which this class of unfortunates could be cared for. Hence, it has been necessary heretofore to appropriate considerable sums of public money to assist these private institutions in caring for the orphaned and abandoned children, for the indigent sick, and for the unfortunate ones who have become stranded in this city.

I for one am ready now to inaugurate a change in this order of things. I would gladly vote for any measure that would look to the erection, at the public expense, by the people of this District of suitable institutions, asylums, and hospitals of their own for the care of orphan children and of other afflicted persons, just as the insane are now cared for. But pending the consideration and enactment of such a bill we must not leave this class of helpless people totally dependent upon private charity. To do so would be cruel and inhuman. I can not support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] because I believe it would have that effect.

The board of children's guardians created under the law of 1892 has not, in my judgment, the authority to take care of the orphans and of the children who are left destitute except such as by regular judicial proceedings have been intrusted by the courts to the care and custody of the board. Without further amendment of the law the board could not take charge of any of the adult cases requiring charity. I will, however, gladly support the amendment offered by my friend from Vermont [Mr. GROUT], which goes, I think, about as far as we can properly go at this time, and which clearly announces the right principle, namely, that we will not give public money to absolutely sectarian institutions, but that we will appropriate public money only to such private charitable institutions as are nonsectarian, and require that money to the last dollar to be supervised in its expenditure by the Commissioners of the District or their duly authorized representatives. Not a dollar of public money should ever be appropriated for any purpose without the right being reserved by Congress to supervise and control its expenditure.

The condition which confronts us at this time makes it imperatively necessary, in my opinion, that we should continue to use these private nonsectarian charitable institutions until we can by law provide others, which belong to the public and can be entirely supported and controlled by the public. If this be done, let no one think that private charity in the District will cease. By no means. The orphan and foundling asylums, the hospitals, and homes that are now owned and controlled by private subscription and enterprise will continue to flourish then as now.

Before we cut loose entirely all public aid from these charities let us provide suitable and sufficient buildings at public expense for the public to properly care for and keep such persons and children and charities as are properly a charge upon the public.

Many of us remember a debate similar to this which occurred in the last Congress on the Indian appropriation bill in regard to providing for the education of Indian children. It was maintained that no money ought to be appropriated to any Indian school of a sectarian character, and that contention was supported by the same reasons that have been advanced in this debate. But the condition that confronted us was, that if we did not continue to aid many of the Indian schools under sectarian control on the reservations until Government schools could be erected we would be compelled to turn several thousand Indian children out of doors for from three to five years, until the Government could provide its own schools in which to educate those Indian children. Practically a similar condition confronts us in this matter.

Let us abolish the present system root and branch, but let us not be too precipitate. I will vote for a bill appropriating any reasonable sum to erect the necessary buildings, and I will vote for an annual appropriation far in excess of that carried in this bill in order that the public money spent in public charity shall be expended and controlled solely by public officials and for public purposes. I think the amendment of my friend from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] a step in the right direction, and hence I shall vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, strike out all of lines 8 and 9: "For the Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish, maintenance, $1,800."

The question being taken, the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 120, noes 33.

Mr. WHEELER called for tellers, but withdrew the call, and the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the German Orphan Asylum, maintenance, $1,800.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph just read.

Mr. GROUT. On what ground does the gentleman move to strike out this paragraph?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I make the motion by way of an amendment.

Mr. GROUT. But why? This is not one of the sectarian institutions.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It is, for all practical purposes, a sectarian institution.

Mr. GROUT. It is not in the least so; everybody says it is not. As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment offered to perfect the bill in accordance with the ideas of the gentleman from Nebraska. My idea is that we should leave in the bill this institution and every other one that is not sectarian. I want all the sectarian institutions to go out, and then, when that is done, the House can choose between the idea of the gentleman from Nebraska and mine. I think mine is a sensible, practical solution of this question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware is recognized.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I speak to the motion to strike out. I think the sensible thing for us to do at this time—and I say it with all the lingering prejudices and predilections and preconceptions concerning this matter of sectarianism that can reasonably and decently subsist in the human mind [laughter]—the sensible thing for us to do at this time, it seems to me, is to defer this radical measure of iconoclasm, this thorough uprooting of the existing system of charities in the District of Columbia, until we can put something at least as good, if not better, in its place. [Laughter and applause.]

There are a great many people who do not believe in the Bible, but until they can furnish a better Bible than the one we have, they had better hold their peace. [Laughter.] And with regard to these charities, I will say that I will vote for a system of legislation so comprehensive and complete as will antedate for at least a year any such movement as seems to be indicated to-day. I will vote to establish a preparatory system, putting under the control of a commission or a board of trustees such a system of charity as will effectively meet the demands of this District under the circumstances; and when that is accomplished I will vote with other gentlemen here to wipe out all private and sectarian institutions so far as Government appropriations are concerned. I think this policy is one of common sense and humanity. I would rather sacrifice $1,000 than see a little child suffer. And if I am not able to take care of a suffering child, while my neighbor is, I will let him do it.

I know that it is reasonable to object to certain phases and systems of sectarianism. Out of all the eleven hundred creeds that this world has been furnished with by the theologians, I would not know which one to choose, if I were called upon to select one as superior to all the others. And it is claimed by many of these church organizations that they have a "corner" on salvation, the consequence being that men become prejudiced to an illegitimate extent. But here is a question of common humanity; and we had better stand still and see the salvation of the Lord before we move a step farther. [Applause.]

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, evidently the "salvation" of good judgment is very much needed by some gentlemen. Now, in this matter I desire that there shall be no confusion of ideas. My judgment is that this item should go out—if for no other reason, that it is a child-caring institution. All the institutions of that class should stand together. A wise administration demands it. My proposition, which has been read at the Clerk's desk as part of my remarks, would remit this institution, with all the children under its care, to the board of children's guardians; and the superintendent of that board is the superintendent of this German Orphan Asylum. Gentlemen need not get behind the small children when they propose to leave in this bill a lingering trace of the demon we are trying to cast out. These children's institutions ought to stand together. They should be cared for and they will be cared for if my amendment prevails, because every dollar that is reported in this bill for the care of children will be appropriated to this board of children's guardians, of which, as I have said, the superintendent is also the superintendent of this German Orphan Asylum.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If the gentleman's proposition be adopted will the institution receive the private contributions of wealthy German-Americans?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Why not?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It will not.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. German citizens certainly will not withhold their contributions simply because the Government chooses to give its aid in a different direction.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I venture to say in reply to the gentleman that all the wealthy people of this District will stop contributing for the care of the insane, the sick, the orphans of the District as soon as you put these institutions under public control. The German Orphan Asylum of this city is for all practical purposes a public institution; it is not private. It is public in its character, and it is nonsectarian. It receives the children of Catholics, Protestants, Jews—adherents of every denomination. For that reason I say it is nonsectarian and public in its character.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman from Missouri evidently labors under the impression that the purpose of this amendment is to place the German Orphan Asylum under public control. In that he is entirely mistaken. No such purpose as that is contemplated by my motion, which is simply to strike out the appropriations for this institution, and instead of appropriating money to the institution directly to place all children properly a public charge under the control of the board of children's guardians, who, if they see fit to place children in this institution, can make arrangements with the asylum for doing so for a definite time, making fair payment therefor.

I apprehend the fact that this institution is thus patronized by the board of children's guardians will not cause the philanthropic German-Americans all over the country to withhold the hand of charity. Is it possible that any man will withhold one dollar from a charitable institution because the Government no longer appropriates to it directly?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly not. There is no good reason why it should be so. If that were so, then the spirit of those people whom I have always cherished is certainly petty and mean beyond all possible expression. [Applause.] But, sir, they will not withhold their hand; they will bestow on this institution in the future as they have done in the past a liberality which is only measured by the capacity of the people contributing. Charity will yet abide in the land and be made practical by the application of right principle. Let private institutions be supported by private means; public institutions by public funds. Let the two classes be kept distinct—no intermeddling of one with the other; let there be no divided responsibility or divided control. What we seek here is to carry these child-caring institutions together in one body over to the board of children's guardians, and let the Government control the expenditure of Government money.

Mr. MEREDITH. And the children must go through the criminal court before they can get any benefit from our appropriation.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska moves to strike out the appropriation of $1,800 for the German Orphan Asylum. The gentleman is logical. We have already struck out the appropriation for the Church Orphanage Association of St. Johns Parish, $1,800. As the gentleman from Nebraska claims, the action of the Committee of the Whole in striking out, by a majority of 100, the item just voted on shows clearly the purpose of the committee to strike out all appropriations of this class.

Now, the gentleman from Nebraska is further logical by saying that later on, when we reach the board of children's guardians, he will move to increase that appropriation and give them the money to care for such children as they can get jurisdiction of; and it seems to me that if it is our purpose to take out these provisions, as is indicated by the action of the committee on the last vote, that his motion is apt and proper, because the board of children's guardians is one that abounds in law. You may ask me if I think it will take care of all the children that ought to be taken care of. I answer, I do not; but that it will take care of a part of them; and we had better do a part of a good thing than to do it all wrong.

That is all I desire to say about it. I might add further, however, that along the line of sectarian institutions the gentlemen run from a shadow. This is not appropriating for sectarian institutions, but it is the Government of the United States, pending the time it builds its own schools and hospitals, hiring those who have the equipment to care for helpless poor children. The Committee of the Whole House, however, is evidently in the mood for striking them out, and that being the case, let us do the next best thing. When you strike out the paragraphs, as we have already done in one instance, let us proceed to provide for the children according to the conditions that exist, as far as we can do so.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Are you able to point out in the bill which of these particular institutions are denominational in their character?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know whether this particular institution which we have now under consideration is Lutheran or not. I am informed, however, by those around me that it is.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. But are you able to point out those that are denominational in this paragraph?

Mr. CANNON. No; I am not——

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Is there any gentleman on the Appropriations Committee prepared to give us that information?

Mr. CANNON (continuing). And I will say to my friend that I did not inquire about the denominations of these various institutions, because I could not find anybody else who had the means to care for these children during the coming year except the institutions that have cared for them heretofore. The Committee of the Whole House, however, seems to be desirous of taking another position in regard to the matter; it has voted down the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations, and now I think it is our duty to do the next best thing we can.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman will allow me, I think I can point out the denominational institutions in this bill. If he will begin with line 8 of page 38, down to line 24 on the same page, all of them are denominational—from and including line 8 to the bottom of the page.

Mr. BARTHOLDT was recognized.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me a single remark?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. The gentleman from Illinois stated that the majority of the committee are for striking out all of the appropriations to institutions other than that known as the board of children's guardians. I deny it. I think this majority have only so far gone as to commit themselves to the proposition of striking from the bill all the appropriations to denominational or sectarian institutions.

Mr. GROUT. That is right, exactly.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. And that these nonsectarian institutions are proper channels for the distribution of public funds where we have no other means to accomplish that end.

Mr. MEREDITH. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to know which of these institutions are sectarian? Do they not all stand on the same footing?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Not at all. There are a number of them that stand on an entirely different footing from the one now under consideration.

Mr. MEREDITH. Will the gentleman please explain which?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Take the item on page 39, at the top of the page, for instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has been recognized.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to participate in this discussion. I am entirely unprepared for it, but I feel obliged to give expression to some feelings and some ideas that I entertain on this question.

I am in favor of a general provision striking out all appropriations, whether they may be made by the nation, by the State, or by a municipality, in favor of sectarian or private charitable institutions, and I held that view long before what is known as the A. P. A. was organized. But in this instance I desire to call the attention of the committee first to the fact that what is everybody's business is nobody's business; and I presume the majority of the members would feel just as I do in a matter of this kind. If we transfer these institutions from private care and control to public care and control, every taxpayer of the country—and certainly we as their representatives should feel the same way—would say that he pays taxes for the support of public institutions and does not feel called upon to contribute privately to the charitable institutions of any denomination to which he may belong.

So it is with this German Orphan Asylum. This institution is maintained by the private contributions of wealthy citizens of this city and the surrounding country. The very moment you transfer it to public control those private contributions will cease, for the reason that all these charitable and philanthropic people will say that they as taxpayers should not be called upon to contribute to private objects. Therefore I appeal to this committee that in a matter where no sectarian purposes are served this action should not be taken on the ground of sectarianism. This institution is nonsectarian. The question has been asked by my friend from Ohio [Mr WILSON] whether it was Lutheran or Catholic. As one who has visited that institution and talked to the manager of it, I say to you that I know, no matter whether a child is Catholic or Protestant, Jew or Mohammedan, or heathen, the child is admitted to that institution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I apprehend what the gentleman has said about this German Orphan Asylum applies with equal truth to St. John's Orphan Asylum, which a moment ago was stricken out of the bill. There has never been a claim made but that the doors of St. John's Orphan Asylum have been open to children of all denominations, with parents of all creeds, just as in this case. But the objection which the majority of the House took to it was that it was sectarian, meaning by that that it was under sectarian management, not that it closed its doors to any particular sect. Understand me, I am not committing myself to sympathy with the views of the majority, but merely trying to get this bill upon some logical footing of some kind, and to show the gentleman that all he is now saying for the German Orphan Asylum could have been said with equal truth for the orphan asylum for which the appropriation was just now stricken out.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I think the gentleman from Mississippi is mistaken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I am not mistaken in this matter. I know I am not.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman allow me to answer him? St. John's Orphan Asylum, which has just now been stricken out, is under the control of a specific religious denomination, while the German Orphan Home is not. That is the difference.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Is it not a German institution?

Mr. KIEFER. German-American.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. German-Americans of all denominations are in control of that institution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a private institution, is it not?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. With a public purpose.

Mr. MEREDITH. I want to call the attention of this committee to one fact that seems to have been overlooked. The question which should address itself to this House is, how can we do the most good with the sum of money which this committee has determined to appropriate for charity? How can we do the most good with the sum which has been determined upon by the committee, whether we shall appropriate it as supplemental to these institutions which are already in existence, or whether we shall give it to the board of children's guardians, as some of my friends think we ought.

Mr. Chairman, there is very much in what has been said by my friend from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT]. As he has suggested, when we undertake to place these institutions under control of the Government, they will withhold the contributions which they have been in the habit of making. I think, so far as I am concerned, that all these institutions ought to stand or fall together. Which are sectarian and which are not, I can not determine; but I do not care whether they are sectarian or not. I believe that by supplementing the funds of those institutions with contributions from the Government we can do more toward alleviating the suffering of these insane and these orphan children than we can by putting the whole of this amount in the hands of the board of children's guardians; and it is for that purpose that I opposed, as I did a few moments ago, the vote by which one of these institutions was stricken from the benefits of this appropriation.

I believe in separating church and state, for I come from a State in which is inscribed upon the monument of the author of the Declaration of Independence these words, suggested by himself:

Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, author of the statute of religious freedom, and founder of the University of Virginia.

I say I believe, with him, that church and state should be separated; but when we have been in the habit, year after year, of making appropriations toward the charities of this city, the only question which can control me is, how can we do the most good with the money which we propose to appropriate?

Believing that by supplementing these institutions we can do the most good in that way, I shall vote to prevent the striking out of any one of these institutions, and shall stand by the report of the committee.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, as to this motion of the gentleman from Nebraska to strike out this German Orphan Asylum, I want to say what I need not repeat at length, because the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILSON] said what was on my mind as to the statement by the gentleman from Illinois, setting forth his understanding of the last vote. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], when upon the floor, said something about the management of this German Orphan Asylum. If it is really in charge of any one church it may fairly be called a sectarian institution; and if it is, I am with the gentleman from Nebraska, and shall favor it being stricken out. I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri if he said it was under control of a single church?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I did not, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GROUT. Very well; tell the committee all about it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. Chairman, I will state that the board of trustees of the German Orphans' Home consists of representatives of all denominations. I am personally acquainted with Catholics and Protestants on that board of trustees; and let me say, in addition, that one gentleman, a Hebrew, who is well known to all of you, a gentleman who was consul-general to Egypt under General Grant's Administration, and who now lives in this city, saw me this morning personally and asked me to use what little influence I may have for the retention of this item in the appropriation bill.

Mr. GROUT. Well, let me ask the gentleman one further question, and that is, whether the president of that institution is not himself a Jew?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes, sir; the last president was a Hebrew.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, clearly this does not fall in the list of sectarian institutions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Can I ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the gentleman from Vermont to state that his objection is that these institutions are sectarian?

Mr. GROUT. That is the objection to those that I would strike out absolutely. The amendment I propose to offer will reconcile me to the others if it should be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask you this question in that connection: Is there any sound political principle underlying the idea—in which I fully agree and sympathize—that no public fund ought to be given to sectarian institutions except this, that sectarian institutions are always private institutions and not public institutions and the principle underlying is that public funds ought not to be devoted to any other than public purposes?

Mr. GROUT. Well, Mr. Chairman, there is a much broader principle; because any institution that is sectarian is not only private, but it is sure to inculcate the principal dogmas or points of religious belief which it entertains, and I say that the public money should not be appropriated for that purpose. That is my answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the gentleman this question: Do you think, it being granted that a given institution is a private institution, and that it does not exist for public purposes, that that institution is any better than it would be to have some religion of some sort or even a medley of religions?

Mr. GROUT. Yes and no, is my answer to that question. A charitable institution in this country without any religion would indeed be a rarity. Religion is one of the great bulwarks of this free country, and really so because our religion is free. The American people as a people are religious and devotional. They believe in a Supreme Being. They may differ on points of belief; they do; and they quarrel over those points sometimes in a most ungracious way.

If the gentleman's question calls for my reason for discriminating against a charity under the exclusive control of a single church, I answer it is because in that case the church left to itself would be sure, so zealous is every Christian organization to strengthen its numbers, to employ proselyting influences with those under its control, whereas if the charity were founded on humanitarian lines rather than religious, and under control of different creeds, the different dogmas would neutralize each other, sectarianism would become silent, and the only thought would be how to help humanity. And in this work the different creeds would rival each other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROUT. I would like a minute to explain the extent of this amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. TALBERT addressed the Chair.

Mr. GROUT addressed the Chair.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, before he takes his seat, I would suggest to him, if it meets his view, to try and secure a limit of debate to ten or fifteen minutes, and let us vote on this amendment.

Mr. GROUT. A wise suggestion. I will ask unanimous consent that debate close in ten minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion upon this question, and it seems to me that that discussion has been entirely in the wrong direction. Here we have seven or eight or a dozen institutions which are enumerated in this bill that are either public or private institutions. They are denominational, and thereby sectarian, or they are not; and the question is whether this body shall appropriate public money for private uses.

Now, according to the theory of the Government under which we live and by which we are governed, it is wrong in practice for us to appropriate public money for private uses. These being private institutions, it is against the theory of our Government and against our idea of what is right that we should appropriate money to maintain them. The question is not whether they are good and moral institutions. The question is not whether they are doing good or not. They are doing good. But the question that we should settle by our action here is the question of principle which is involved. That is the question, whether it is right or whether it is wrong to appropriate public funds for private purposes. I, believing that it is wrong, shall vote against appropriating money for any one of these institutions. If it is wrong to appropriate for one it is wrong to appropriate for any or for all of them.

My friend from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] has said that almost from time immemorial, from the first establishment of these institutions, these appropriations have been made. That does not make any difference, Mr. Chairman. If we have been going wrong, let us say right here and now that we will begin to right that wrong. It is never too late to turn around and retrace your steps and right a wrong that you have been doing in the past. Therefore if the American Congress has been doing wrong by appropriating public money for private uses, let us turn around now and undo that wrong.

I shall vote against the appropriations contained in this bill for every one of these sectarian institutions because I believe such appropriation of the public money to be wrong in principle, wrong in theory, and wrong in practice. We are going on here headlong, like greyhounds leaping a fence, appropriating the public money regardless of what is right or what is wrong, regardless of the interests of the great mass of the people, and I for one think it is time that we should call a halt and at least consider for a moment what we have been doing, and, if we find that we have been doing wrong, put a stop to that wrong by wiping from the pending bill these appropriations for private institutions.

Mr. MEREDITH. I understand that my friend from South Carolina is opposed to appropriating any money for this purpose?

Mr. TALBERT. To these institutions.

Mr. MEREDITH. Do you agree that money should be appropriated to public institutions for these purposes?

Mr. TALBERT. If there was any public institution of this kind here I would be willing to appropriate for it, but I am not willing to appropriate for these private institutions. Gentlemen say they are not sectarian institutions, but they are private institutions, and the distinction is only that between tweedledum and tweedledee.

Mr. MEREDITH. Let me get through with my question, if you please.

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. MEREDITH. If this money is to be appropriated at all, does it not strike my friend that we ought to consider what good is to be done by the appropriation, and how best we can do it?

Mr. TALBERT. I do not deny that a large amount of good is being done, but there is a principle involved.

Mr. MEREDITH. But if we can do the most good by supplementing in this way these charitable institutions which have been in existence for years; if we can do more good with the same amount of money in this way than in any other, is it not better for the unfortunates, for whose benefit we make the appropriation, and better for the Government that we should do that?

Mr. TALBERT. Let us do right, my friend, though the heavens fall. Let us stick to the right. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to ask my friend from South Carolina one question.

Mr. TALBERT. All right, though I do not know that I want to stand a civil-service examination here to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of striking out this paragraph because it appropriates public money for a private institution. Private institutions should be sustained by private charities and private money and not by public appropriations. A great deal of argument has been brought to bear upon this question, tending and undertaking to show that the private institutions mentioned in this bill will be closed up if these appropriations are not made. Mr. Chairman, I deny that any such state of facts will exist. I point you to the fact that in almost every city throughout the United States that is anywhere near the size of Washington institutions of this character are kept up from year to year and are doing just as much good as they do in the city of Washington, without receiving one cent of public money.

Do gentlemen undertake to tell me that this Orphanage Asylum Association, for instance, supported by St. John's Episcopal Church, which, as I understand, is the richest church in the District of Columbia—do gentlemen undertake to say that the doors of that institution will be closed and that its good work will be stopped simply for the reason that this amount of public money is not appropriated to it? It does not seem to me that any gentlemen will claim any such thing as that.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman tell us how he voted on the paragraph making an appropriation for the Home for ex-Union Soldiers and Sailors?

Mr. MILNES. I do not know that I voted at all.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. There was no vote taken on that paragraph.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But it was adopted by the House, and I simply wanted to call the attention of the House to the fact that that is a private institution——

Mr. MILNES. There has been no vote on the question at all.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But in passing the item we were appropriating money for private purposes.

Mr. MILNES. I hope the gentleman will let me occupy a moment or two without interruption.

I now come to the item we are considering, this German Orphan Asylum, supported by rich Germans in the District of Columbia and, as my friend says, throughout the surrounding country. Does the gentleman undertake to make us believe that that institution is going to be closed up simply because the Government refuses to appropriate money for its support? Not by any means. The people who have been supporting that institution are not that kind of people. The same may be said of every other institution named here. As I have said, there are similar institutions throughout the United States in every city of considerable size that are supported by private charity and do not receive one cent of public money, and there is no reason why these institutions should receive any.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman allow me one more question?

Mr. MILNES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is it not a fact that any private institution caring for the sick, for the insane, for orphans, is practically doing public work?

Mr. MILNES. It is doing public good.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is it not a fact that the sick, the insane, and the orphans should be and must be cared for by the public at large; and if there are private institutions caring for them, irrespective of religion, is it not right that they should be maintained and encouraged, unless we are willing to appropriate as much out of the public funds as is now contributed to these institutions by private philanthropists?

Mr. MILNES. Not from public appropriations.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is it not right that nonsectarian institutions might be partly supported by public appropriations?

Mr. MILNES. My simple answer is that this good work will be carried on by these charitable institutions without one dollar of public appropriation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HAINER of Nebraska, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 130, noes 45.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph of the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Will not the gentleman in charge of the bill move now that the committee rise? The House does not seem to be in a frame of mind for deliberate and calm legislation. [Laughter.]

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The Clerk read as follows:

For the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children, maintenance, including repairs, $9,900.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. In explanation of this motion I wish to say it will not be claimed, and is not claimed, that the institution here appropriated for is a sectarian institution. It is, however, private; and the motion of which I have given notice, to be made at the conclusion of these various items, will provide for taking care of destitute children by an appropriation for the board of children's guardians. The entire appropriation will be carried over to that paragraph. My only purpose in moving to strike out this item is that all child-caring institutions should be coordinated and treated alike.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If we strike out all these items and if the amendment which the gentleman proposes to offer later should be adopted, appropriating, I understand, about $61,000 to be placed in the hands of the board of children's guardians, and if it should subsequently be held that the law is not broad enough to authorize the board of children's guardians to take charge of this class of children, then they will not receive any part of this money, will they?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I wish to say——

Mr. NORTHWAY. I ask the gentleman that question: If it should be held that the law in existence is not broad enough to reach this class of children, then they will not be benefited at all by the appropriation of $61,000, will they?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That is true.

Mr. NORTHWAY. And is it not also true that the law is not broad enough to reach them?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No, sir.

Mr. NORTHWAY. And is it not true that the Senate has invariably held that the law does not apply to this class? Is not that true?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I can not comment on what the Senate may or may not have done. For the benefit of the gentleman let me read from section 4 of the act approved July 26, 1892:

The said board shall have the care and supervision of the following classes of children: First, all children committed under section 2 of the act approved February 13, 1885, entitled "An act for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

That includes the incorrigible.

Second, all children who are destitute of suitable homes and adequate means of earning an honest living; all children abandoned by their parents or guardians; all children of habitually drunk or vicious or unfit parents; all children habitually begging on the streets or from door to door; all children kept in vicious or immoral associations; all children known by their language or life to be vicious or incorrigible, whenever such children shall be committed to the care of the board by the police court or the criminal court of the District.

Now, I ask the committee and every member of it, is there any other child that may properly be called a subject of public charity?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Here is the point. The gentleman knows I agree with him on this matter, provided the law is broad enough to reach all these children.

But is it not clear that the law reaches only such children as shall be committed to the board of children's guardians by the court? If it is not perfectly plain, then I am mistaken. I would amend the law, if it be not plain, so that the board would have charge of all of these children. But if it shall be held that the law is not broad enough to reach them, then it seems to me that we are striking out from this provision of the bill this unfortunate class of people without giving them any other relief in the premises.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I know of no children, Mr. Chairman, who are proper subjects of public charity who are not included here. I know no reason why there should not be a determination of the fact as to whether a child is really a public charge. Nor do I know any good reason why that question should not be determined by some court of competent jurisdiction. If any person desires to be supported by public funds, he should prove his status in some court of competent jurisdiction.

And further, if the law is not broad enough, as I stated before, this session of Congress is still young, and we can so widen and broaden it as to make it comprehensive enough to cover all these cases. But there will be no widening or broadening of the law if you make appropriations to all of these institutions, for they will come and say, "Oh, no; you have appropriated already for private institutions, and there is no necessity for further action."

Mr. LACEY. I would like to know, if the gentleman will permit me, whether under his proposition, the incorrigible children——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. LACEY. If I can be recognized in my own right, I will yield to him to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. LACEY. What I wish to know is, whether incorrigible children, and wicked and vicious children, who may be poor, and must necessarily be cared for in some of these institutions, whether they are all provided for in the same place or in the same institution?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Oh, no; they are entirely separated by law, and these children, such as the gentleman describes, are sent by the board of children's guardians to the Reform School. They are not kept together at all.

Mr. LACEY. Just another question. This proposition in the bill seems to include also destitute colored women. Your proposition would strike out that portion of the bill. Would not that be a very great hardship upon these people who have no other source of support?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That is a private institution, and I apprehend that they have resources enough to support them and take care of these people who are not included in the terms of my proposed amendment.

Mr. LACEY. But suppose it is not true? In other words, is it not true that about the only revenue they have for the support of this institution is that which is derived from appropriations by Congress? Is it not true also that the negro throughout the United States since the war, especially in the District of Columbia, is placed at a disadvantange in seeking employment? He is not given any vote except at primary elections, and that is sometimes not accorded to him; and this provision, as I understand it, is intended to aid an institution which protects the widows and orphans in a separate establishment of this class of people. Ought not it to be made an exception from the gentleman's motion? It is not denominational in any sense of the word, but applies to the particularly unfortunate race who are in a transition state.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. They are entitled, of course, to all possible consideration. They are the wards of the nation, and properly so. But I apprehend in a provision, in a subsequent amendment that I shall offer, all these children can be taken care of just the same. They may be sent to this or some other institution, where they will be cared for under the control of the board of children's guardians of the District of Columbia.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Well, I am occupying the floor in the time of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Can the gentleman state how large a proportion of the total income of this institution the sum of $9,900 appropriated by this bill represents? The motion now pending would strike out the sum fixed in the bill——

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I can not.

Mr. PITNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I can answer that question. This appropriation carries $9,900 for the coming year. There were in the fiscal year 1895 other sources of revenue, amounting in all to $2,557, of which $2,404 were received from the board of children's guardians under the District of Columbia appropriation act. Practically the institution is supported entirely from the public Treasury.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Then it is supported by the Government?

Mr. PITNEY. Almost entirely.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Then I see no reason for circumlocution. This is a Government institution. If it is a Government institution the Government ought to provide the money to support it and make the necessary appropriations. I do not think we violate any principle in making an appropriation in this case.

Mr. PICKLER. As I understand it, if the gentleman from Nebraska will permit me, you only take care now of the criminal orphans and pauper orphans, do you not, by the board of children's guardians, which has only jurisdiction of that class?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Well, destitute children, particularly of that kind.

Mr. PICKLER. Are there not many worthy orphan children that ought to have some help, and upon whom the brand or stigma should not be placed that they are paupers or criminals?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have already called attention to the fact that the law provides arrangements for all children who are destitute or who have not sufficient means of support.

Mr. PICKLER. Do they not have to go into court?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly they do.

Mr. PICKLER. Are there not a great many worthy poor people who have children that need some help, but whose children ought not to be adjudged criminals and paupers before they can have that help?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have called attention to the fact that in the first item of charities there is an appropriation of $13,000 for general relief of the poor, and for the Freedman's Hospital and Asylum there is an appropriation of $22,500, and other large sums are appropriated in the bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Will that help these institutions that are stricken out?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly it will not.

Mr. PITNEY. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children was incorporated in the year 1863?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have some little general knowledge of it. I understand so.

Mr. PITNEY. Under an act of Congress signed by President Lincoln?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I understand so.

Mr. PITNEY. And that it has no means of support except from the National Treasury?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No; I have not that information.

Mr. PITNEY. Gentlemen are voting here on something which they do not know anything about.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, this is an exceptional item, wholly so, and my friend, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY], is asking some questions which will bring the facts to the understanding of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. PITNEY. I did not desire to say anything at this time, Mr. Chairman, but I will state for the information of the Committee of the Whole that the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children was incorporated in 1863, under an act of Congress signed by President Lincoln, for the care and maintenance of destitute women and children of the colored race in the District of Columbia; that for the fiscal year 1895 they expended $12,457, of which $9,900 was appropriated directly to that association in the District of Columbia appropriation bill; $2,404 was taken from the appropriation for the board of children's guardians, and the trifling balance of $153 was from miscellaneous sources. This institution is a home in which aged colored women and destitute colored orphans are cared for, and if this appropriation is struck out, unless the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] will offer some other substitute for it, that home will have to be closed. I am opposed to this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, that is a very good speech, and unless the committee are going to follow my friend from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] with his battle-ax indiscriminately, certainly this item stands on exceptional ground. The gentleman has given the date of the incorporation of this institution, and has stated that it has no source of supply except from the Government, and in the very nature of the case it must be so. The colored people of this country are poor, and whatever may be done by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] with these other institutions, he should spare the ax on this one.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Why this one more than others?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is a Government institution, is it not?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. GROUT. It has been fostered and supported by the Government, although it exists under a private charter. But in that very charter permission is given, for the time being, to occupy any of the public grounds free of expense, and for a time they used the barracks. When it became necessary to change the location, the Government appropriated money to buy ground and erect a building, and from that day until now an appropriation has been made every year, and only a very few dollars come from any private source.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROUT. Yes.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Has the gentleman looked up this matter and does he know that this institution has no other source of supply except the Government appropriation? Does the gentleman personally know that?

Mr. GROUT. I do, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. If that is the case, I have no objection to voting down this proposition.

Mr. PITNEY. It is not a private institution in the same sense as the others.

Mr. GROUT. Certainly it is; but I wish to say that my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] has explained the situation with reference to it——

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I want to ask my friend another question. Is it not true that many of the others are equally dependent on appropriations of the Government?

Mr. GROUT. No; this is exceptional.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that this board of guardians have appropriated over $2,000——

Mr. PITNEY. If I had the floor I should be glad to yield for a question.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the gentleman yielded to me for a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Will you allow me a question? I want to ask for information. I understand——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Nebraska to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that the board of children's guardians appropriated over $2,000 for this colored home.

Mr. PITNEY. That is not the correct way to state it. Mr. Chairman, the board of children's guardians placed in this colored home all those colored children who had been committed by decree of the court to the care of that board, and for the care of those children who were so committed to the colored home $2,404 was paid; but there were other children in the colored home besides those sent there by the board of guardians.

Mr. THOMAS. And if this is stricken out is there anything to prevent this board from appropriating more?

Mr. PITNEY. They can only appropriate for such colored children as are sent by them to the home—the board of children's guardians can not provide for the aged colored women who are in the home, or for the other children there.

Mr. THOMAS. And they can not make any appropriation for any other person.

Mr. GROUT. Does the gentleman from Nebraska withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Vermont give the Chair his attention?

Mr. FOOTE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. We are unable to hear what is being said, there is so much confusion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one point of order already pending.

Mr. FOOTE. I make the point of order that we can not hear on account of the confusion in the Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken. All gentlemen will be seated and cease conversation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My point of order is to inquire if the Chair stated that the gentleman from Nebraska had withdrawn his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska does not withdraw his amendment.

Mr. GROUT. I yielded to permit a question to be asked and then I was drifted away from the reason which I was about to give why this should not be put in the hands of the children's guardians. It is true if you send children there, as suggested by the inquiry of the gentleman from Michigan, if it were under their control, as stated to me by an officer of that institution, if they were put under the children's guardians, it would be a complete disturbance and disorganization of the institution. They send these boys and girls—or rather boys; I am not certain that it included girls—but these boys, who had been committed by the courts, who were sent to that institution produce disorder in the institution that nullify the discipline and good management, and that is the reason why it should not be remitted to the children's guardians. I wanted the committee to understand that.

Mr. PITNEY. Permit me one question. Is it not a fact that the Home for Destitute Colored Women and Children does take care of aged colored women?

Mr. GROUT. There are twenty-odd of them there.

Mr. PITNEY. Then, if this appropriation is voted down in accordance with the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska, will there be any fund from which aged colored women can be cared for in that institution?

Mr. GROUT. Not as this bill will then stand, and not unless the House makes some other provision.

Mr. HARDY. I want to ask the gentleman from New Jersey if it is not a fact that at the close of the war a great many colored women whose husbands had been sold into slavery farther south came to the city of Washington as a refuge and have lived here ever since, and that some of them are to-day in that institution?

Mr. PITNEY. I was not in the city of Washington at the close of the war, and have not been here ever since; but my information is that the gentleman is correct in his statement. [Laughter and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CRAIN. I have an amendment I desire to offer to the amendment, Mr. Chairman. Strike out of the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska the words "including repairs."

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me every proposition which has been advanced this afternoon in relation to striking out items of this appropriation bill has been supported by arguments which are equally applicable to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska. The underlying principle of all these appropriations, according to those who have supported those amendments, has been the antagonism of the gentlemen making them to the appropriation of public money for private purposes.

Now, no man who has taken a position favorable to this amendment has advanced a solitary argument that has not been advanced in support of the other amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska. I understood that gentleman to say a few moments ago, in response to a statement made by the gentleman from Vermont who has charge of this bill, that because of the paucity of private charity extended to this institution, as suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY]—that because of the paucity of private charity extended to this institution he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Oh, no.

Mr. CRAIN. I thought I overheard the gentleman say something like this to the gentleman from New Jersey: "Is it true that only $157 has been contributed? Do you state that on your own information and belief?" The gentleman from New Jersey replied "Yes," and then the gentleman from Nebraska said: "Then I withdraw my amendment."

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. CRAIN. Possibly, but I think I understood the gentleman correctly.

Mr. SAYERS. He was just wavering then. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAIN. Wabbling, was he? Well, however that may have been, Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the gentleman from Nebraska stands now by the logic of the situation and by the consistency of his position.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. CRAIN. I have only five minutes. At the close of my five minutes I will give the gentleman all the time he wants, either by moving to strike out the last word or by offering a substitute for his amendment. I do not wish to be discourteous, but my time is very limited. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me strange that at this late day we should find Southern Representatives standing here and advocating the retention in an appropriation bill of a provision appropriating $9,900 for the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children. It is equally strange, sir, that gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, who have voted for the striking out of these other items from this bill, should suddenly lose sight of what they call the great underlying principle, and should vote for this item upon the paltry pretext of the paucity of private charity in this case, as if that could be an excuse for losing sight of their "great underlying principle." If that be the guiding motive for your votes, gentlemen on the other side, I would suggest to the beneficiaries under the remaining appropriations in this bill that after we adjourn to-day they unite and send up statements that hereafter they will accept nothing from private charity, and will thus qualify themselves to be the recipients of your bounty. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROUT. I hope we shall have a vote now, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. SKINNER. Mr. Chairman, this item in the bill illustrates a thought that I would impress upon the committee, and that is, that this is practically the administration of a charity rather than an appropriation for it, for the appropriation is to be made anyway, and, permit me say, it is very small for charities; in other words, that the sanction of the Committee on Appropriations is the best justification for making this appropriation. The position of the committee in its relation to the public of this District is, that it is the initiatory legislative body of the District, and what I want to impress upon you is that that committee, with the sanction of this House, is as competent to administer of this charity as the board of children's guardians of orphans or any other officials who may be selected to administer it.

If I understand correctly, there is a reserve motive to appropriate for these charities the sum called for by this bill—the gentleman from Nebraska makes war upon the sum total of the appropriation—but my idea is that if this committee, in its wisdom, after the full hearing and consideration it has given to the subject, chooses to say that this church or that church can do the best service in one field, that another church can do the best service in another field, that one society can do the best service in another field, and another society in another field, then we here ought not to make open war against the churches and say that they are incompetent to administer the charities that we desire to have administered in this District.

Again, I desire members to understand that the church in the District of Columbia bears the same relation to the country and the general public that the District itself bears. You come here, representing your constituencies; you spend your money, you leave behind you orphans; you leave behind you inmates of asylums. In other words, by your presence in this national capital you increase the charge of the local churches which ask to have aid extended to them in the field of charity, and the church here stands upon the same high plane that a private individual in the District of Columbia does, and asks the General Government to assist in bearing the burden which you help to bring upon them. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me only right and proper that a due share of these burdens should be borne by the Government, and the channels through which most good can be accomplished ought to be those through which your charity should operate. I think, therefore, that the gentleman from Nebraska has made a mistake in attempting to wipe out any of these appropriations.

Yet there can not be drawn a distinction between the church and a society that wants to care for the colored people. This committee has said that according to their information one church can administer charity in one quarter and another church in another. When they come to the colored people they say that this relief association can administer this charity. So, Mr. Chairman, I do declare that this committee is as competent, with the sanction of the Committee of the Whole and the House of Representatives, to administer this charity as it is possible for it to be administered by any new organ——

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I had thought we might be able to close the debate and have a vote on this question to-night; but I find there are other gentlemen who want to speak, so I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5210) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

KILLING OF ITALIAN LABORERS IN COLORADO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Congress:

In my last annual message allusion was made to the lawless killing of certain Italian laborers in the State of Colorado, and it was added that "the dependent families of some of the unfortunate victims invite by their deplorable condition gracious provision for their needs."

It now appears that, in addition to three of these laborers who were riotously killed, two others who escaped death by flight incurred pitiable disabilities through exposure and privation.

Without discussing the question of the liability of the United States for these results, either by reason of treaty obligations or under the general rules of international law, I venture to urge upon the Congress the propriety of making from the public Treasury prompt and reasonable pecuniary provision for those injured and for the families of those who were killed.

To aid in the consideration of the subject, I append hereto a report of the Secretary of State, accompanied by certain correspondence which quite fully presents all the features of the several cases.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF SAN FRANCISCO,
San Francisco, January 21, 1896.

RESOLUTION—THE FUNDING BILL.

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, having under consideration all the conditions involved, and having reference to the message of the President of the United States to the Fiftieth Congress, recommending the Government to secure itself by legal process against financial loss in its relations with the subsidized overland railroads, urgently protests against the refunding of the indebtedness of these railroads by legal enactment.

Resolved, That while the question of the management of railways by the Government admits of a fair discussion, the obligation of a corporation to pay its debts is as binding as that of an individual debtor, and when unable to do this the ordinary process of law should prevail, otherwise our people have a right to complain that, while citizens generally are made to obey the law, rich corporations and millionaires are exempt.

Resolved, That the people dependent upon the line of the subsidized defaulting railroads, in the case of their debt being refunded, must endure the burden of excessive cost of transportation for the many years of the extension demanded, an obvious injustice, which will retard the development of the dependent territory, whereas a change of management, either directly by the Government or by lease, under proper restrictions, will develop the territory and increase the value of the railway itself. For these valid reasons this chamber of commerce favors foreclosure by the Government as the result of default in the payment of the debt owing it.

Resolved, That attested copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, the Pacific Coast delegation in Congress, and to the Committees in the Senate and House of Representatives having the measure under consideration; also, that copies be furnished the public press, requesting its support.

HUGH CRAIG, President.

Whereas said conference did adopt the following resolutions and address:

"EQUITABLE PROTECTION.

"To the American People and the Congress of the United States:

"At a conference of the representatives of chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and delegates of the Farmers' National Congress, and other commercial organizations from the various sections of the Union, and delegates of the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, under the auspices of the National Grange, Worcester, Mass., November 14, 1895, the following resolutions were adopted:

"'Whereas agricultural staples, being exports, can not be protected by a tariff on imports, as are manufactures, and American ships in the foreign trade, being built by partly protected material and under protection wages, are at a disadvantage in the world's competition with ships constructed and operated in cheap-labor or free-trade countries:

"'Resolved by this conference, That this depressed condition demands the enactment of such legislation as will put both these great industries upon a footing of equality with those now specially fostered by the Government.

"'Resolved, That we call upon Congress to equalize the protective system by extending to agricultural staples and American shipping in the foreign trade that just measure of protection to which they are entitled so long as protection is the controlling and public policy of the nation.

"'Resolved, That we recommend to the consideration of the Congress of the United States and to the American people what is known as the "Lubin proposition" for the protection of American agriculture and shipping in the foreign trade.'

"The same resolutions, in substance, have been recently adopted by the chambers of commerce of San Francisco; Seattle, Wash.; Portland, Oreg.; the Board of Trade of Bath, Me.; the leading Atlantic Coast shipbuilders at a meeting in Philadelphia, and the Farmers' National Congress at Atlanta, Ga.

"THE 'LUBIN PROPOSITION'

"is for the protection of American agricultural staples, a portion of which are exported, by the payment of a bounty by the Federal Government upon such exports and the protection of American shipping in the foreign trade, to the end that all industries in the United States which in any manner compete with the cheaper labor of foreign countries may be protected equally with such industries as are now protected by a tariff on imports.

"For seventy-six years a similar policy was in successful operation in Great Britain, and it only ceased when that nation no longer exported agricultural staples, after which the tariff upon imports protected her agriculturists until the repeal of what are known as the "corn laws."

"It is believed that the enactment into laws of this proposition will have the effect of making steadily profitable the pursuit of agricultural employment and replace present threatened disaster to our farm-owning population by prosperity, the result of which would have an equally beneficial effect upon our great manufacturing industries, which are so vitally dependent upon our farming population for the purchase of their products. And it will effect for shipping in the foreign trade a stimulus to shipowning and shipbuilding to such an extent that our own home-built, home-manned, and American-owned vessels shall once more carry the larger share of our foreign commerce, thereby creating a much greater home market for American farm and factory products among those engaged in shipping, and the retention in the United States of the many millions of dollars which we now expend annually to enrich foreign shipowners and shipbuilders.

"We earnestly urge upon the American people and the Congress of the United States the early and favorable consideration of such measures on the lines here indicated as shall give prosperity to all American industries by equitable protection.

"Unanimously adopted.

"J. H. BRIGHAM,
"Chairman, and Master National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry.
"HUGH CRAIG,
"ALEX. R. SMITH,
"Secretary, representing leading Atlantic Coast Shipbuilders."

Whereas at no period in the country's history has a more important assemblage been held of the great industrial interests, at which, outside of the agricultural interest represented, there were present representatives of our greatest manufacturing, commercial, and shipping interests, representing hundreds of millions of dollars of capital, coming from all sections of this country, who unanimously demanded of our lawmakers equal protection for agriculture and shipping with other interest: Therefore

Resolved by the State Grange of Virginia in regular annual session assembled in the city of Richmond, 1896, That we congratulate the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, upon the success of its efforts to bring together the leading interests of our country for the purpose of harmonizing differences of opinion and building up the material interest of all classes, as enunciated and demanded by our declaration of purposes as far back as 1873.

Resolved, That we readopt the resolutions and address of the Worcester conference, and urge the Senators and Representatives from Virginia in Congress to use their best efforts for the passage of laws to secure the ends therein set forth.

Resolved, That the legislative committee of this grange present a copy of these resolutions to each Senator and Representative from Virginia, and request that they present the same to Congress.

THOS. S. STADDEN,
Secretary Virginia State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry.
ALEX. J. WEDDERBURN,

C., praying for the extension of the Metropolitan Street Railway in East Washington. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. MCMILLAN) presented a memorial of the North Capitol and Eckington Citizens' Association of the District of Columbia, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation granting to the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company of the District of Columbia the authority to extend their tracks on certain streets, avenues, and roads in the city of Washington and the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

[State of Rhode Island, etc. In general assembly, January session, A. D. 1896.]

Resolution concerning the construction of a channel into Great Pond Harbor, Block Island, R. I.

Whereas, believing that a harbor of refuge for general commerce and navigation in Block Island, R. I., would be of incalculable value to the coastwise trade of the North Atlantic States and of the thousands of lives engaged in navigation; and

Whereas the State of Rhode Island and the town of New Shoreham have appropriated $100,000 to construct a channel into the Great Salt Pond, Block Island; and

Whereas a channel about 400 feet wide and 12 feet deep has been cut from the ocean into said pond, which has an area of about 800 acres of tide water available and suitable for the safe anchorage of ships during storms; and

Whereas by the report of the United States Engineer it is estimated that by an additional appropriation of about $97,567 a permanent ship channel, with a central depth of 25 feet, can be constructed, connecting this large body of water with the ocean; and

Whereas the development of this project would afford the revenue cutters in the coast protection a commanding position of the entire coast of southern Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, and the Navy, in case of foreign war, a key to Long Island Sound and Narragansett Bay and the rivers and tributaries thereof:

Be it therefore resolved, That the general assembly of Rhode Island respectfully and urgently request the United States Government to protect the interest of the State and town by completing this project of national importance, and to appropriate the necessary amount therefor.

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State be, and they hereby are, requested to use their best efforts to secure the development of this project, and to procure the necessary appropriation by Congress for such purpose.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to forward a copy of the above preamble and resolutions to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND,
Office of the Secretary of State:

PROVIDENCE, January 28, 1896.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I present a petition numerously signed by citizens of Portland, Oreg., praying for the passage of a law securing to the manufacturers of the Northwest the patronage of the United States for all goods used by the Government in each and every department on the Pacific Coast. The petitioners call attention to the fact that there are no goods used at any of the Indian agencies or at any of the Government posts but which can be, as a matter of fact, manufactured on the Pacific Coast and purchased there at a lower figure than many of such supplies which are now being purchased in the Eastern market. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE REVENUE BILL AND SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2749) to temporarily increase revenue to meet the expenses of Government and provide against a deficiency, to report it with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the part printed in italics, and also to amend the title so that it will read as follows: "An act to provide for the free coinage of silver, and for other purposes."

Mr. President, I am disposed to say somewhat, as the proclamations in Massachusetts end, "God save the Commonwealth." I will add what perhaps it is unnecessary for me to say, that I was not in favor of the action of a majority of the Committee on Finance. I shall endeavor to bring up the bill to-morrow, unless it shall interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the amendment be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment reported as a substitute by the Committee on Finance will be read.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That from and after the passage of this act the mints of the United States shall be open to the coinage of silver, and there shall be coined dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, of standard silver, nine-tenths fine, as provided by the act of January 18, 1837, and upon the same terms and subject to the limitations and provisions of law regulating the coinage and legal-tender quality of gold; and whenever the said coins herein provided for shall be received into the Treasury, certificates may be issued therefor in the manner now provided by law.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall coin into standard silver dollars, as soon as practicable, according to the provisions of section 1 of this act, from the silver bullion purchased under authority of the act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," that portion of said silver bullion which represents the seigniorage or profit to the Government, to wit, the difference between the cost of the silver purchased under said act and its coined value; and said silver dollars so coined shall be used in the payment of the current expenses of the Government; and for the purpose of making the said seigniorage immediately available for use as money, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue silver certificates against it, as if it was already coined and in the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That no national-bank note shall be hereafter issued of a denomination less than $10, and all notes of such banks now outstanding of denominations less than that sum shall be, as rapidly as practicable, taken up, redeemed, and canceled, and notes of $10 and larger denominations shall be issued in their stead under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem the United States notes, commonly called "greenbacks," and also the Treasury notes issued under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890, when presented for redemption, in standard silver dollars or in gold coin, using for redemption of said notes either gold or silver coins, or both, not at the option of the holder, but exclusively at the option of the Treasury Department, and said notes, commonly called "greenbacks," when so redeemed, shall be reissued as provided by the act of May 31, 1878.

Mr. QUAY. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance with instructions to report the original bill and the amendment as separate propositions.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I second the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN and others. Question!

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, are we not upon the order of the presentation of reports in the morning business? The question might come up on motion when we reach the order of resolutions, but not at this particular time.

Mr. QUAY. Do I understand that the Senator from New York objects to my motion at the present time?

Mr. HILL. I was suggesting a parliamentary inquiry as to whether it is in order.

Mr. QUAY. Of course it is in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point made by the Senator from New York, that the motion can not be entertained at this time.

Mr. QUAY. Then I understand distinctly that the Senator from New York makes the point that the motion I have just now made is not in order.

Mr. HILL. The point has already been made and sustained by the Chair, and I decline to discuss it further.

Mr. QUAY. Then I ask unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ALLEN. I object.

Mr. HILL. There is objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. HOAR. May the request be stated before objection is heard? I have not yet heard the request. I should like to have it stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania state his request in full?

Mr. QUAY. I request the unanimous consent of the Senate to entertain a motion to recommit the bill as reported from the Committee on Finance with instructions to report the original bill and the amendment as separate propositions.

Mr. HILL. To that I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

I voted in committee for this report in order that the matter, which is interesting so many people, might come before the Senate, the more I think of it the more there seems to be in the way of objection to any legislation upon the subject. I do not wish to have it understood that I shall support the bill even in its amended form in the Senate. PENSION STATISTICS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit a series of resolutions of inquiry, and as I think there will be no objection to them I will ask for their immediate consideration.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Whereas there are certain pension measures now pending before the Senate Committee on Pensions upon which such information as can be furnished by the Commissioner of Pensions should be placed at the disposal of Congress, and in order that there may be established from the records of the Pension Office some reliable estimate of the mortality rate of pensioners: Therefore

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to furnish the Senate, at the earliest possible moment, the statistics and information which the records of the Pension Office disclose, from the 1st day of July, 1895, to the 1st day of January, 1896, of invalid pensioners pensioned under the general law, showing the total number of names on the roll July 1, 1895, and January 1, 1896, and the number of deaths which have occurred during that period in each classification or grade of such pensions.

Second. The same information relative to pensions granted under the act of June 27, 1890.

Third. The same information relative to widow pensioners under each act, which latter shall include under a separate classification all extinctions of title for pensions from death, remarriage, or abandonment.

Fourth. The same information as regards dependent pensioners under each act except that of June 27, 1890.

Fifth. Statistics with regard to each class of pensioners under acts granting pensions to survivors and their widows under Mexican and Indian wars and the war of 1812.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby requested to furnish to the Senate, at the earliest possible moment, a statistical statement, showing the number of pension certificates issued during the six months ended January 1, 1896, classifying the same as originals of each class and reissues of each class, showing whether increases or reductions, increased pensions or any other classification usually observed, and also statistics showing the suspension and other stopping of pensions from causes other than deaths or extinction of title by remarriage, covering each class of pensions under each class of acts separately.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that his resolutions are in an unusual form, in the fact that they require the Secretary of the Interior to furnish the information to the committee. Let them require the Secretary to furnish the information to the Senate for the use of the committee, and then they will be in accordance with the uniform rule on the subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will accept that suggestion. While I am on my feet, I will state that I observe the last resolution requests the Secretary. I ask that the word "requested" be changed to "directed."

Mr. HARRIS. Let it read "directed."

Mr. GALLINGER. I will likewise accept the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the resolutions as modified?

Mr. PALMER. As the resolutions are somewhat complex and cover a great deal of ground, I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to allow them to lie over and be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

INVESTIGATION OF MAIL BAG REPAIR DIVISION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. KYLE January 28, 1896:

Whereas the character of the wages, work, discipline, and hours of labor in the mail-bag-repair division of the Government Post-Office Department have been severely condemned by the Washington Times, a reputable newspaper published in the District of Columbia; and

Whereas it is also alleged by this newspaper that Government mail bags are made by contract convict labor, and that there are also various irregularities in the fulfillment and payments of awards as well as irregularities in other contracts pertaining to the work of this division: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is hereby directed to investigate these charges and report thereon to this body at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is not a matter of very great importance, but on Thursday last the Senate in the morning hour was considering a joint resolution in regard to the distribution of seeds. I asked before the expiration of the morning hour that it might go over without losing its place, in order that I might speak upon it to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Missouri to ask unanimous consent that that joint resolution be taken from the Calendar for consideration?

Mr. VEST. I have no disposition to take any advantage or to displace the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. KYLE. I believe my resolution has the right of way.

Mr. VEST. I have merely called attention to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to make some remarks upon the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senator from South Dakota, who offered this resolution, would have somewhat changed its form before he asked the Senate to pass upon it. As I understand the Senator in his remarks, the facts which he submitted to the Senate to justify its action in passing the resolution directing an investigation of the indefinite and uncertain allegations made in the resolution, were based not upon any information or personal knowledge possessed by him, but entirely, and almost exclusively, I may say, upon rumors which were embodied in articles appearing in one of the newspapers in the city of Washington, and I believe some letters which he had received from persons claiming to be employees of the repair bag shop of the Post-Office Department. I had hoped that he would change the form of the resolution so that it would simply call upon the Post-Office Department for information as to these allegations, and make the allegations themselves more definite and specific than they appear in the resolution.

Mr. KYLE. Will the Senator agree to the resolution with a modification?

Mr. FAULKNER. I think it would be proper for me to agree to it, for I am satisfied, after a most thorough investigation, that if such a resolution were passed by the Senate the official information which would be conveyed to this body from the Post-Office Department would settle completely, finally, and definitely every allegation set forth or charged by inference or otherwise in the resolution as drawn and offered by the Senator from South Dakota. With reference to the question of wages, to the question of work, of discipline, and of the hours of labor, every one of them, in my judgment, would be answered officially by the Department, showing conclusively that nothing which has been stated in the press or in the letters addressed to the Senator has any real foundation in fact.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator from West Virginia whether he knows, as a matter of fact, that the Post-Office Department has investigated the charges made in the resolution, independent of the officer or officers who are chiefly in charge of the mail bag repair shop?

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that some of the charges contained by inference in the resolution, I believe, at one time were perhaps to a limited extent justified; but that was years ago, prior to the time when the present Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Nielson, came into office.

I will further state, in reply to the question of the Senator from Nebraska, that in July, 1894, when the present Second Assistant Postmaster-General entered upon the discharge of his duties, he found many things of which to complain as to the administration and discharge of the duties of the persons connected with the repair bag shop of the Post-Office Department, so much so that he at once conferred with the Postmaster-General, Mr. Bissell, then in charge of the Post-Office Department, and recommended the appointment of a commission of the most skilled and experienced officers of the Department to go into the whole subject and to make a thorough investigation as to what he considered bad administration in that particular bureau of the Department.

As soon as that commission was appointed, consisting of the best and most skilled and experienced men in the Department, it made a most thorough investigation of all the workings of the repair shop and recommended a great many modifications in the operation and the administration of that particular bureau. For example, the commission found that it had been the custom to furnish the ladies who were working in that bureau with tea and crackers and cheese at lunch, the amount for those articles being paid from the fund which is derived from the sale of the old material in the office.

While the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was anxious to do everything he could to ameliorate the condition of labor in that office, he, at the same time, submitted to the officers of the Department who had charge of the question, and of the passing of vouchers, whether or not that was a proper legal expenditure under the law, and he was notified by the accounting officers that such an expenditure was entirely illegal and unjustifiable, and ought not to be permitted. He found that there was no one at that time who was responsible for the sale of old material. The head of the bureau would dispose of such material and account for it, of course—at least so far as the commission on investigation could trace it was properly accounted for; but it was an improper administration of the funds of the Government to allow anyone who was not a bonded officer of the Government to handle the public funds.

The commission of investigation appointed by the Postmaster-General reported to him that the only person who could make sales of this waste or worthless material was the disbursing bonded officer of the Department, who should do it in accordance with the provisions of law, after full advertisement, and be accountable under his bond for the amount received and for turning it properly into the Treasury, as the law required.

I can say to the Senator from South Dakota that since September, 1894, every dollar's worth of waste material from the bag repair workshop has been sold under the authority of the Post-Office Department, and been disposed of by the disbursing bonded officer of the Department after advertisement and at auction, the accounts being properly kept and the money turned into the Treasury.

Mr. President, what may have occurred prior to that time it is impossible for the officers now in charge of the Department to give any information about, but these irregularities in the administration of the bureau certainly existed in July, 1894, and have been corrected by those now in charge and responsible for the performance of the duties of the officers of the Post-Office Department from that time to this.

One thing that struck me as very surprising, and I admit it is a matter which should have been investigated if there had been any truth in it, was the statement by the Senator from South Dakota that the persons employed in the mail bag repairing shop of the Post-Office Department were receiving but from 40 to 60 cents a day. If that were so, it would not be fair compensation for a fair day's labor; some one was to blame for it; and certainly there should be a public exposure of such low wages paid by the Government for such disagreeable work. I am frank to say, as I stated, that it was a serious question, and one that should be looked into by the Senate. But I find that my friend from South Dakota is entirely mistaken in reference to that question. Up to September, I think, of the past year there were but five or seven—I do not remember which—sewing machines in the mail bag repair division.

They were put on as a matter of experiment. The Post-Office Department, in the investigation of the bureau, found that as to the patches sewed by hand the thread would ravel, the stitches at least would average some half an inch long, and the patches were very roughly put on. The Department was seeking some method by which it could have the patches put on more securely and at the same time could have the work coming from the bag division look better. The Department therefore introduced five or seven of these machines as an experiment. It was found that they did the work most admirably, and so in the latter part of last year the Department introduced 46 more of those machines. The ladies had been doing hand work, and they did not like to be transferred to the sewing-machine work, but they started in, I believe, on the 1st of last January, and the average work done by them was most excellent even from the very introduction of the experiment.

When the experiment was started, basing the wages upon what they considered fair, the Department fixed that the sewing-machine women should have 2 cents a bag for patching and 1 cent for darning, making 3 cents for the complete repair of a bag. That seemed to go along very well until about the middle of the month, when a committee of ladies waited upon the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Neilson, and urged him to do away with the machines. He told them that he did not think it was a fair test for the Department to stop so soon the experiment which had been made, and that he felt it was proper to continue the experiment longer to see how the work would turn out, say, to the end of the month. For three days after the visit of that committee, by some concert of action, the work of the mail bag repair division fell off to one-third of what had been the average work from the first to the middle of the month.

Nothing, however, was said in the Department in reference to this, and gradually the work reached the ordinary number of bags which it had been shown the machines and the employees were capable of doing in the first part of the month. So we find that from the 1st day of January the average number of bags repaired by a sewing-machine woman was 64 a day. At 2 cents a bag that would be $1.28 a day. We find at the end of the month that the average ran up to 80 bags a day, which would be $1.60. That is much larger wages than these ladies were getting under the former system adopted by the Department. The pay of the ladies in that bureau had been $35 a month. Some of them did a full day's work, some of them went beyond what would be a fair average amount of work, some of them who were being paid by the month fell off to a very small average of bags because they were not paid for the actual amount of work done, but by the month. In order to place all of these ladies working in the same room, in the same bureau, on a perfect plane of absolute equality, so that each could earn according to her own desire to labor, the system was changed to the piece system, so that those industrious, skilled, or otherwise could earn compensation for what they were able to do, and those who were not quite so skilled, or were new hands, would not of course receive the full compensation received by the best hands in the bureau. But their work will average fully up to 65 or 70 bags throughout the entire month, which gives a compensation which certainly is not one that can be excepted to by any Senator or by the country.

In order to satisfy myself, I went to the Post-Office Department and required the pay roll and the account of the work done per day to be shown to me personally, and when I saw the evidence of what those ladies were making daily and monthly and compared it with the compensation paid to the hard-worked women who are standing in the stores of this town at $3 or $4 a week, I felt, although that was not a very agreeable shop to work in, that I was glad that there were some women earning decent wages for the amount of labor which they were giving. I know nothing so hard upon the females in this town as standing for twelve hours behind the counters of the great stores at a compensation of from $3 to $4 a week.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to inquire if it is a fact that able-bodied, full-grown women are working in stores in this District for $3 or $4 a week?

Mr. FAULKNER. I have been so informed, and I will say, and the Senator will perhaps remember that we received the information when he and I at the same time were members of the committee who were making an investigation of the number of hours that women stood behind counters in the stores, and a bill was reported and passed the Senate—whether it became a law or not I do not remember—requiring employers to furnish stools to be used by the women behind the counters, so that they might rest themselves during the hours when they were not actively employed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I think that very beneficent measure did become a law. It was opposed by some of those very men who are now oppressing these women, as the Senator suggests. I do not know whether or not the statute is being observed, but I fear not. Matters are worse than I supposed as regards women employed in stores in this District. I did not imagine that any merchant in the city of Washington could ask or would ask a woman to work for $3 or $4 a week. If it is so, certainly some means ought to be adopted to make it otherwise, if possible.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will simply say, in conclusion, on the question of wages, that if the Senator would so modify or change the resolution as to call for the information from the Department, he would find that the amount of compensation paid those ladies this month, when the experiment has actually been made, is better on an average than the amount paid under the old system of $35 a month. It has worked out in that way, and it is demonstrating its effectiveness, both in the amount paid to the wage earner who is willing to work and in the interest of the Department.

A great deal has been said about the bags being in an uncleanly and filthy condition, having cats, etc., in them. Mr. President, that is utterly impossible under the system adopted there, and I saw the operation of it. The bags are all thoroughly inspected before they are sent to the repair shop, where these ladies are at work. One of the recommendations of the commission appointed in July, 1894, to which I have referred, was that the Government was being imposed upon by requiring bags that were almost absolutely worthless to be patched, which was a loss to the Government itself. The result was that the commission recommended to the Postmaster-General to appoint more inspectors as to the character of the bags that were sent to the repair shops where the patches were put on by these ladies. The result of that recommendation was that additional inspectors were put on, and they eliminated from the bags that had previously been required to be patched thousands of bags which they regarded as too thoroughly destroyed by decay or filth to be sent into the Department, and for that reason indirectly enabled these ladies, by giving them bags requiring less repair, an opportunity to repair more bags than they could have done under the old system.

If the Senator had read the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to the Postmaster-General, filed in July, 1895, he would have found there a recommendation for the appropriation of $40,000 additional, with a view not only to meet the increased demand of the Post-Office Department for bags, but that more of the thoroughly worn-out bags, which the Department had been patching, even when they were almost falling apart, might be destroyed. I believe in the House of Representatives the Postmaster-General has succeeded in getting that additional appropriation.

Another thing I wish to state to the Senate, and I think it is well the Senator should know it if he has not gone through this bureau. I thought there might be a hardship on the part of these ladies working the sewing machines until I ascertained that the power applied to the working of the machines is steam power. I found long arms arranged on the machines so that the ladies do not have to hold the bags up, but they are held up by mechanical appliances, and the entire power applied to the machines is steam; so there really is nothing to do but to put the bags upon this arm, and even the pieces for patching are brought to the ladies without their moving from the position they occupy in doing the work, not of the exact size, it is true, but small pieces from which they cut the proper sizes to patch the holes. It is true they have very disagreeable work to do, but I think it is but fair, after all the discussion which has taken place with reference to this matter, that these statements should be made.

This is not a very cleanly occupation for anyone; it is intensely disagreeable. Everyone who has watched the great, fast lightning express trains going through this country, with the system they have at inferior stations of throwing off the mail by hand, will understand that the mail bags must become dusty and filthy; it is utterly unavoidable; and we shall either have to establish a laundry here in Washington for the purpose of washing the bags, or those who are engaged in patching them will necessarily have to be subjected to some inconvenience and discomfort. Everyone is informed of that when applying for one of these positions.

I wish to state from my inspection of the building that it is perhaps as good a building, as well arranged with all the appliances that could be suggested for the comfort of persons engaged in an occupation so disagreeable, as could well be devised. The plumbing, I think, is almost the best I have seen in the city of Washington, or as good as any, and I may say it has just recently been completed. There are nice retiring rooms for the ladies to change their street costumes for those in which they work during the hours that the Department requires them to be engaged in this business. That is for the purpose of not taking a nice, good, presentable dress that the ladies wear upon the street and bringing it in contact in any way with the dust and dirt incident to this occupation. They have retiring rooms now to change their apparel, so that when they go out in the evening they go out with their fresh dresses looking as respectable as I have no doubt all the ladies are. Every suggestion that I have been able to think of for the comfort of the ladies engaged in such an occupation has been furnished by the Department.

There was some remark made with reference to indignities heaped upon the ladies. I can find nothing suggested in the articles quoted by the Senator from South Dakota or in any remarks he has made that implies any indignities whatever, and therefore I shall merely pass over that suggestion in the resolution, because nothing has been said or could be said, in my judgment, in reference to heaping indignities upon those ladies.

With respect to the question of hours, I will state that there is a law which fixes that. The hours of labor in the Departments are eight, and they are eight in this bureau. Under the law they have no right to work beyond eight hours, and during that time the employees of course have a half hour for the purpose of obtaining lunch.

The only other proposition which I remember to have been stated by the Senator from South Dakota is with reference to convict labor. In the remarks of the Senator he seemed to imply that the Department employs convict labor in the making of these bags, but of course I suppose it was merely a slip of the tongue, as the authority upon which he bases his statement distinctly stated that the contractors with the Department employed convict labor. Every contract for bags that is being carried out under this Administration was made under a former Administration. I do not mean to criticise the Post-Office Department under the former Administration in making those contracts, because I assert, as a question of law, that the Post-Office Department could not have controlled the question even had the officers known the fact that the lowest responsible bidder employed convict labor.

Sir, four years ago this question was brought to the attention of Congress. A resolution was brought into Congress urging the proposition that in awarding contracts after advertisement the officers of the Department should refuse to give the contract to the lowest responsible bidder even, if credibly informed that he contemplated using convict labor in the execution of the contract. Congress, for some reason, did not deem it proper to pass the resolution and embody it in the form of a law, but left standing upon the statute books the sole and only limitation or control, at least, of the officers, which requires that they shall advertise for a given length of time and then shall give the contract to the lowest responsible bidder.

Although those contracts were made under a former Administration and run for four years, I can not say that I could even cast any reflection or utter any criticism upon the action of those officers in the execution of the law. It is for Congress to determine the question, and Congress is the forum where that question must be determined and instructions given in reference to it. I think that is recognized even by the paper which makes this attack. It makes no criticism upon the Department in making the contract, but appeals to Congress, which is the proper forum to which the appeal should be made, that a law shall be passed governing and regulating and controlling this matter.

I would have no objection whatever to a resolution, if it is deemed proper by the Senator from South Dakota, asking for official information in relation to all these questions. If not, and he would force the Senate to pass a resolution giving directions, I would feel it my duty to go further than I have gone and to lay many facts before the Senate that I thought proper not to do when merely making a brief, but as I hope complete statement upon the different points suggested by the Senator in his remarks, with the hope expressed at the time that the resolution would be so modified as to call for this information officially from the Department.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, as it now lacks but five minutes till 2 o'clock it is impossible for me to reply to the Senator from West Virginia. He has certainly made a very plausible statement from his point of view.

I wish to state that I have no criticism whatever to make of the present Postmaster-General, who is a man held in the highest esteem by all parties in both branches of Congress; but I believe there is something wrong in the mail bag repair bureau of the Post-Office Department. There can not be so much smoke without some fire. When all those girls come by committees to members of the Senate and implore us to take up the matter, there must be something wrong.

I have letters from numbers of the girls. Of course the Senator from West Virginia presents here, by way of rebuttal, the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. He gets the report from Mr. Tyler, his next assistant, who gets information from the superintendent of this bureau, whoever he is.

I do not wish to cast any reflection upon the reliability of the evidence, but I do not think I will take the statements of the present superintendent of that department. I have a statement, Mr. President, from the forelady in charge of all the girls, which directly contradicts the statements made by the Senator from West Virginia, and this woman is nearer to the hearts of the girls and knows more of their complaints than any other person in the office.

The Senator has stated a good deal about the sanitary condition of the building and the pleasant surroundings of the girls, etc.; does he know of the fact that it is a common occurrence to have the police patrol wagon driven to the back of the building for the purpose of receiving fainting working girls? I have letters here stating that that is a common occurrence—a regular sweat-shop practice.

Mr. FAULKNER. I can only state that the records of the last month do not show that to have been the case, because I do not find that any of the ladies have not made day's wages. I do not know what it was before, but I have the pay roll for this month, and I do not find that any of them have lost a half day.

Mr. KYLE. I will read a part of the letter of the forelady of the shop. She says:

After the bags were inspected for repairs the select work was given to the women to be repaired, and they made about 80 cents per day, but since the exposure in the Times of this terrible sweat shop and its cruelties they yesterday increased the pay of the darners one-quarter of a cent.

That is since the discussion in the Senate.

Mr. FAULKNER. I neglected to state that the pay of the darners was increased some four days ago, and it was based upon the fact that the experiments demonstrated that the darners were not getting so much wages as they did under the former system. In order to give them the full wages that they received under the former system the wages were increased, this simply being an experiment during the present month to test the fact as to what is the proper wages to pay.

Mr. KYLE. I will read the rest of the letter.

The rest of the workers get about the same as they have been getting. Remember, also, that up to the time of the exposure they only had a limited amount of work, which reduced their pay to 70 or 80 cents per day. Now they make some more. Yesterday some of the most expert women employed there, stick as hard as they were able, could not, with all their skill, earn $1.50 per day, and the majority of them much less, and so it goes.

I have numbers of statements from those women. There are a few who I am informed are very strong and able-bodied women. These are able to do an extraordinary amount of work, which makes the average much greater. The majority of the girls, and they are very respectable girls, are not able to earn more than $26 or $27 a month, according to their own testimony.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to know the name of any one of those ladies.

Mr. HARRIS. Inasmuch as there seems to be a difference between the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from South Dakota as to the exact facts in the case, each Senator doubtless and unquestionably stating the facts exactly as he understands them, had not the Senator from South Dakota better reform his resolution so as to require the Postmaster-General to give to the Senate the precise facts in respect to these matters?

Mr. KYLE. Not if he allows the superintendent to make the report. I believe it would be entirely an ex parte report.

Mr. HARRIS. I should be glad to know of the Senator how we are to get facts in respect to departmental services unless we take them from the heads of the respective Departments. We can not go into the details as to how the head of a Department is to ascertain every detail of the service, but when we have the assurance of the head of the Department it would be a state of facts upon which I at least would base my action.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to see an investigation by the Post-Office Committee, and the report brought before the Senate. It is stated upon the authority of one of the members of the House of Representatives, who is interested in an employee in that office, that the boss there chased him around the room with a razor in his hand.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator permit me to explain that matter?

Mr. KYLE. I do not presume the Senator knows anything about it.

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes, I do. I inquired about it, because I saw that the Senator from South Dakota had so stated in an interview; and I have the official statement in reference to it.

Mr. KYLE. I presume that is on the books.

Mr. FAULKNER. No; but I have the names of four witnesses to prove the correctness of my statement. The foreman of that bureau is somewhat of an actor, and during the lunch recess he had a sword in his hand, and I believe he went through some of the actions of a theatrical character, which he assumed at the time for the amusement of those ladies. A colored preacher from Georgia, who was appointed as a messenger or a laborer in that office upon the recommendation of the gentleman to whom the Senator refers, became very much frightened when he saw him in this attitude, and he at once ran away. But two days afterwards, with the distinguished gentleman who had secured his appointment, he came back and said that he wanted to go home to preach the gospel, and asked that his son should be substituted in his place, which was done. That is how the story originated, and all these statements are based on about the same evidence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. KYLE. I ask what becomes of the resolution?

Mr. FAULKNER. It goes to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes to the Calendar under the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 708) to amend section 4 of an act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads, and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 1547) to extend the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court of appeals, eighth circuit, over certain suits now pending therein on appeal and writ of error from the United States court in the Indian Territory; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 23) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to use a portion of the appropriation for new iron roof for foundry at navy-yard, Washington, D. C., in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," for repairs to the walls of said foundry.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 173) to provide American registers for the barks Minde and Johan Ludwig;

A bill (H. R. 1691) to authorize the St. Louis and Oklahoma City Railroad Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian and Oklahoma Territories, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 2917) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to pay, from their own funds, for certain legal services rendered the "Old Settlers" or Western Cherokee Indians; and

A bill (H. R. 3812) to authorize the Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Choctaw Nation in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 285) for the relief of the Independence National Bank of Philadelphia, Pa.; and

A bill (S. 1046) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved February 27, 1893.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Maine to allow me to ask unanimous consent that the resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations may be made the regular order for to-morrow. They can be laid aside temporarily whenever appropriation bills are presented.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that course. I do not want to make any agreement, however, that will in any way interfere with the appropriation bills which have the right of way. It is very desirable that we shall go on and consider the urgent deficiency appropriation bill and pass it. The Committee on Appropriations now have four bills before the Senate, and we desire to pass them all this week. I wish to get the urgent deficiency appropriation bill out of the way to-day or to-morrow; perhaps to-day. If the Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent it must be subject to the appropriation bills.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CALL. I make the request in that way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from Florida whether, if unanimous consent is granted, it will displace the appropriation bill to which the Senator from Maine refers?

Mr. CALL. Certainly not.

Mr. HALE. Subject to appropriation bills.

Mr. GRAY. Or whether upon the determination of that matter the appropriation bill will resume its place?

Mr. HALE. Subject to all appropriation bills. Let the Senator from Florida make his proposition subject to all appropriation bills.

Mr. CALL. That is the proposition I make.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. DUBOIS. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Idaho will withdraw his objection.

Mr. DUBOIS (to Mr. HALE). Allow me to make a statement.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho for a statement.

Mr. DUBOIS. I trust the Senate will not take up the urgent deficiency appropriation bill at this time. There is a resolution pending to distribute the appropriation bills among the various committees of this body. I desire to make that resolution the unfinished business. If the motion of the Senator from Maine is voted down and the resolution to distribute the appropriation bills to committees is taken up and made the unfinished business, I shall at once yield to him in order that he may secure the passage of the urgent deficiency bill. But what I desire is to have a vote of the Senate as to whether they wish to have the appropriation bills distributed among various committees of the Senate.

I think the Senate is entitled to have a vote on that question, and that is the reason why seemingly I antagonize the appropriation bill, although, as I said, I shall yield at once after my resolution is made the unfinished business. I think no one cares to debate it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The debate is proceeding by unanimous consent. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine to proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I will take the sense of the Senate on proceeding to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. If the Senate votes that motion down after the statement of the Senator from Idaho that he desires the other matter, the distribution of appropriation bills, to be made the unfinished business, then, of course, his matter will come up and we shall have a vote upon it. But I will take the sense of the Senate now upon proceeding to the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. DUBOIS. I call for a division.

Mr. HALE. We may as well have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALDRICH answered to his name.

Mr. PEFFER. Allow me to ask a parliamentary question. What will be the business next in order if the motion is voted down?

Mr. ALDRICH. Debate is out of order.

Mr. MORRILL. There has been a response to the roll-call.

Mr. PEFFER. I simply ask what will be the next business in order if the motion is voted down?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule IX will be the regular order. The roll call will be proceeded with.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER (when Mr. ELKINS's name was called). I am informed by the Senator from Vermont that were my colleague, the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] present, he would vote "nay" on this question. I am paired with him on this proposition, and therefore withhold my vote. I should vote "yea" were I at liberty to vote.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. Does his colleague know how he would vote on this question if present?

Mr. QUAY. I really have no authority to state my colleague's position. I presume that he would vote "yea," but I have no authority to say so, and I can give no assurance.

Mr. WALTHALL. I should vote "yea" if I were at liberty to vote.

Mr. WHITE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP] to the Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TILLMAN (after having voted in the negative). I would not imagine that this is a question upon which Senators need pair at all, but as Senators seem to be regarding their pairs and as I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], I withdraw my vote, because I do not know how the Senator from Nebraska would vote if present.

Mr. FRYE. I am informed that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], with whom I am paired, would vote "yea" if present. Therefore I shall vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Aldrich,	Gibson,	Morgan,	Vest,
Allison,	Gray,	Morrill,	Vilas,
Call,	Hale,	Perkins,	Warren,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Platt,	Wetmore.
Cullom,	Hoar,	Quay,
Frye,	Lindsay,	Sherman,
Gear,	Mitchell, Wis.	Teller,

NAYS—44.

Allen,	Carter,	Kyle,	Pettigrew,
Bacon,	Chilton,	Lodge,	Proctor,
Baker,	Clark,	McBride,	Pugh,
Bate,	Davis,	Mantle,	Roach,
Berry,	Dubois,	Martin,	Sewell,
Blanchard,	Gallinger,	Mills,	Smith,
Brown,	George,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Stewart,
Burrows,	Gordon,	Nelson,	Turpie,
Butler,	Hansbrough,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Caffery,	Hill,	Pasco,	White,
Cannon,	Jones, Nev.	Peffer,	Wilson.

NOT VOTING—20.

Blackburn,	Elkins,	Jones, Ark.	Squire,
Brice,	Faulkner,	McMillan,	Thurston,
Cameron,	Gorman,	Murphy,	Tillman,
Chandler,	Hawley,	Pritchard,	Walthall,
Daniel,	Irby,	Shoup,	Wolcott.

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

PROPOSED DISTRIBUTION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. DUBOIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution on the Table Calendar numbered 2.

Mr. CALL. Before that motion is put I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho, if he will allow me——

Mr. DUBOIS. I should like to make the resolution the unfinished business, and then I will yield very cheerfully to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HALE. It becomes the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state the motion of the Senator from Idaho. The Senator from Florida can then be heard. The title of the resolution indicated by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Table Calendar, Order of Business 2. Amendment proposed by Mr. DUBOIS to paragraph 1, Rule XVI, of the standing rules of the Senate.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. DUBOIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida has addressed the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the resolution be read for information.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to request the Senator from Idaho to allow the Cuban resolution to come up, inasmuch as the resolution he has moved will provoke a great deal of discussion.

Mr. DUBOIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has just been stated.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the resolution be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Pending that, the Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. LODGE. What is the request?

Mr. GEORGE. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. DUBOIS December 5, 1895, as follows:

Resolved, That paragraph 1 of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate be amended by striking out the words "All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce," and inserting the following:

"The general appropriation bills shall be referred to committees as follows:

"To the Committee on Appropriations: The bills for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, for sundry civil expenses, and for all deficiencies;

"To the Committee on Agriculture: The bill for the Agricultural Department;

"To the Committee on Foreign Relations: The consular and diplomatic bill;

"To the Committee on Military Affairs: The bill for the military establishment, including the Military Academy;

"To the Committee on Naval Affairs: The bill for the naval establishment;

"To the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads: The Post-Office appropriation bill;

"To the Committee on Indian Affairs: The bill for Indians and Indian tribes;

"To the Committee on Commerce: The bill for rivers and harbors;

"To the Committee on Coast Defenses: The fortifications bill;

"To the Committee on the District of Columbia: The bill making appropriations for the District; and

"To the Committee on Pensions: The pension appropriation bills."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Idaho, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has been read.

Mr. QUAY. On that let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. ALLEN, and Mr. ALLISON answered to their names.

Mr. VEST. What is the question before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] to proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has been read.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho if, in the event this motion prevails, he intends to go on with the consideration of the resolution to-day?

Mr. DUBOIS. I am very glad to answer that question. I stated before the Senator came in, I think——

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I think all this proceeding is out of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is out of order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BERRY. The Secretary had begun to call the roll and responses had been given.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

Mr. DUBOIS. I should like to make a statement, if the Senator will allow me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That can only be done by unanimous consent. Objection is made, and the roll call will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "yea." I should vote "nay."

Mr. WHITE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP]. I will transfer my pair to the Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] is paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE]. I think both my colleague and the junior Senator from Ohio would vote "nay" if present.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 24; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Dubois December 5, 1895.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask that the pending resolution, which is the regular order, be temporarily laid aside in order that we may proceed to the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, if the Senator from Maine so desires.

Mr. HALE. The Senate has taken its ground advisedly, and I think that this matter had better be settled at once. The Committee on Appropriations is very desirous of knowing if it is to be submitted to the censure of this body and is to report no more appropriation bills. It has already reported bills, and if this resolution passes, instead of the committee attempting to pass them through the body they ought to be referred again to the committee and by them reported back, to be referred to the several committees covered by the resolution.

I do not claim to speak for the committee, as the chairman himself is here; but I have been alluded to by the Senator from Idaho as having charge of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and for my part I am entirely willing that the Senate shall dispose of this matter now. I sought to antagonize the resolution by the ordinary motion to proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. That motion has been voted down by the Senate. The Senate has decided to take up as of more importance a resolution proposing to dismantle the Committee on Appropriations. If the Senate is to do that, as appears to be indicated by the vote just taken, the sooner the committee knows it and the sooner the committee cuts its garment according to the cloth that the majority of the Senate vouchsafe to give to it, the better. I for one am desirous that the matter shall be disposed of, so that hereafter the members of the Committee on Appropriations may have more leisure than they have had heretofore, and may attend to other business, if such is the will of the Senate.

Mr. DUBOIS. I have no idea that any Senators care to debate this question. They are thoroughly familiar with it. Therefore I ask that a vote be taken, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask, for information, whether the first clause of Rule XL has been complied with in regard to this proposed amendment of the rules.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Rhode Island indicate his inquiry more specifically?

Mr. ALDRICH. This is a proposition to amend the rules of the Senate, I understand. I ask whether the provision of the first section of Rule XL has been complied with?

Mr. HARRIS. Requiring written notice?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution was introduced and has gone over one day and more under the rules.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is not advised that any formal notice has been given other than he has indicated.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the provision of the rule may be read. It seems to me if we are to make such an important change in the rules as this proposes it should certainly be done in accordance with the rules of the Senate. I take it for granted that there can not be so much haste required in regard to it that we can not follow the plain and explicit rules of the Senate when changes are to be made. I make the suggestion that the rule has not been complied with, that no notice has been given.

Mr. BATE. As this seems to be a matter that calls for some investigation, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HILL. I hope that motion will be voted down. We may as well fight this out now as at any other time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to make a suggestion to my friend from Rhode Island, in the light of the two yea-and-nay votes we have had, which show a majority of about two to one in favor of the policy indicated by the resolution of the Senator from Idaho. I am quite in sympathy with the views of the Senator from Rhode Island, and have voted with him upon these two questions; I am quite clear in the opinion that this resolution is not in order as it now stands; but I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will not raise the question of order. Let us determine the question now and at once upon its merits and be done with it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no disposition to antagonize the plain will of the Senate as expressed by the votes which the Senator from Tennessee has mentioned, but it does seem to me that in a rule which changes vitally the practice of the Senate, and whose consequence for good or for ill must be very far-reaching, the rules of the Senate should certainly be complied with. I see no reason at present why I should withdraw the point which I have made that the resolution is not now in order, and will not be in order until the proper notice has been given.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I make a point of order against the point of order that is raised that by the proceedings which have already been had upon the resolution the point of order made by the Senator from Rhode Island has been waived; that the resolution occupies the position to-day that it holds on the Calendar by reason of the debate and proceedings that have been had upon it, as though the notice required under the rule had been given.

Mr. DUBOIS. I rose to suggest that the resolution is in order, it seems to me, by the vote of the Senate just taken, which does away with any requirement of the rule as to previous notice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island calls the attention of the Chair and of the Senate to Rule XL, which reads:

> No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof.

Mr. ALDRICH. Upon the point made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], if the Chair please, I take it any Senator has a right to offer a resolution here, whether it is in order or not. There is no way of preventing the offering of a resolution; and the resolution, if no action is taken upon it, goes to the Calendar without any action of the Senate whatever. It has been the custom of the Senate for a great many years to allow resolutions to be offered and go to the Calendar for the purpose of having speeches made on them. There was no time at which this point of order could have been made except when the resolution was taken up for action, and the minute it was taken up for action I made the point which I have now suggested.

Mr. STEWART. I think that the point made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is perfectly correct. If anything is settled, it is this matter of notice. In all proceedings before the courts and otherwise, such a point must be taken advantage of before action is had. You can not take advantage of it after the case has gone to trial.

Mr. ALDRICH. When could I have made the point of order?

Mr. STEWART. The Senator could have made the point of order when the motion was made to take up the resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon; nothing was in order then; no debate was in order.

Mr. STEWART. A point of order can always be made. If it was not in order to consider the point of order then it was not in order to vote to take up the resolution. If, when you reach a case in court, parties stand by and let the case be taken up and proceeded with and do not make an objection, an objection falls altogether. The proposition to take up the resolution was distinctly made and perfectly understood, and the Senate having voted to take it up, that act waives all preceding requirement as to notice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to determine the question of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire, with the permission of the Chair, simply to make one observation. It seems to me that the point of order might have been properly made against the resolution when the motion was made. Furthermore, it strikes me it is a common-sense conclusion that when the resolution itself was offered proposing to amend the rule, and definitely calling attention to it, and the resolution remained on the Calendar of the Senate for over a month, it was a notice of the change of the rule, and it ought to be so construed.

Mr. ALDRICH. Notice in writing?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; the resolution is in writing.

Mr. HILL. This is not a motion to suspend any rule. It is not the case of a formal notice to do that. It is simply a proposition to amend the rules. When the Senator from Idaho rose in his place in December last and proposed an amendment to the rules and asked that it lie upon the table, and afterwards made a speech upon it, and it went over, and has been here upon the table during all this period, that is ample notice within the rule.

In the second place, if any point of that character was to be made it should have been made before we proceeded to consider the resolution. The Senate deliberately voted, by a large majority, to proceed to the consideration of this proposed amendment of the rules, and we had entered upon its consideration before the point was raised. Therefore, upon that point alone the question of order is not well taken.

But I do not place it upon any such narrow ground. I place it upon the ground that under our rules the Senator from Idaho made a distinct proposition by the resolution. Is not that a notice to the Senate within all the forms of parliamentary procedure? Certainly it is. All that is required is that the Senate shall not have sprung upon it at a moment's notice a proposition to amend the rules. This is ample notice within the rule, and it is the best way to proceed because it is the fairest. The resolution has been here. Every Senator has made up his mind in regard to the resolution, and the majority ought to be permitted to pass on the resolution if it sees fit. As the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] suggests to me, what better notice could have been given?

Mr. MILLS. It is the only way to get it.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply desire to say that the Senator from Idaho has introduced a resolution that is now pending, which in effect changes at least one of the standing rules of the Senate. The introduction of that resolution is not the notice that Rule XL requires and demands. Rule XL requires that in addition to the resolution he shall give notice of the rules or the precise parts of rules that are to be modified, suspended, or changed by his resolution, and that written notice must be upon the table at least one day before the consideration of such a resolution.

In respect to the other point, I venture to say that no Senator can find a single instance in the whole history of this body where the point of order may not be made at any stage of the proceeding. The point of order is never waived, but it may be made by a Senator at any moment from the beginning of the consideration to the final disposition of the proposition.

Mr. HILL. As an elementary proposition, I should dissent from that view. When a Senator makes any of the divers motions that he can make in the Senate a point of order must be made at the time. A Senator asks unanimous consent. Consent must be given or refused then. After a Senator has been speaking for some length of time a Senator can not rise then and say, "I withdraw my consent; I raise a point of order; there is nothing before the Senate."

Let us see where this new argument would leave the Senate? The proposition is made to amend the rules. A resolution is a notice. It is a notice to the Senate within any fair construction of the rules. What follows? If, after debate, this resolution should now be referred to the Committee on Rules, and after due deliberation upon the question the Committee on Rules should report it, with its sanction, for adoption, then would Senators say that there had not been a day's notice of the resolution, and would we not act upon the report of that committee? Certainly we would have acted upon it. There is no rule that requires a resolution proposing to amend a rule to be referred to the Committee on Rules. That is a question purely within the discretion of the Senate. If the point made be held to be true, it must be for the purpose of preventing the majority here from doing what they want to do. If that be carried out to its legitimate end, then, even if this resolution had been referred to the Committee on Rules and the Committee had reported it, it would have to stop until some Senator should give one day's notice of this proposition—a most ridiculous and absurd conclusion, in my humble opinion.

Technical notice must be given, I suppose, that a Senator intends to make a motion. In substance in this case the Senate was notified—notified by the formal introduction of the resolution, which specified the particular points that were to be amended.

December 5, 1895, Mr. DUBOIS submitted the following amendment:
"That paragraph 1 of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate be amended by striking out the words," etc.

That was laid on the table and notice of not only one day was given, but it has been here since the 5th day of December. The Senator from Idaho subsequently made a speech upon the proposed amendment and now calls it up for action. It is just as properly before the Senate as if the Committee on Rules had reported divers amendments.

Have not all the propositions to amend the rules been in just this form? Have they not all been submitted to the Committee on Rules? Are not these various amendments before the Committee on Rules? That committee could have reported, and this is just as much in order as if presented by the report of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make one suggestion for the consideration of the Chair, and that is, if the construction of the rule which the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] insists on be correct, what is the use of the rule? There is a general rule that all resolutions shall go over one day if a single Senator demands. So it seems very clear that the introduction of a resolution—which, of course, is in writing, as they all are—and its going over one day is not a compliance with the rule, because that is the universal rule as to all resolutions which must be considered first by unanimous consent. Therefore this rule was certainly intended to accomplish something else than that. It means that there must be some other notice in writing by the Senator desiring to amend or suspend a rule a day beforehand than the mere introduction of a resolution for that purpose.

Mr. DUBOIS. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. Would the Senator from Massachusetts think my statement a sufficient notice? On December 11, among other things, I said:

I trust that the proposed amendment will not be referred to the Committee on Rules until such reference is accompanied with an instruction from the Senate as to the decision of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Did the Senator say that in writing?

Mr. DUBOIS. I spoke it.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think it is a sufficient "notice in writing" for the Senator from Idaho to say something orally.

Mr. DUBOIS. It is very evident that the Senator from Idaho intended to give notice to the Senate that he intended, if possible, to have a vote upon the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I rather hesitate taking any part in this matter, because it seems to me of the most trifling importance just now. The Senator from Idaho has his resolution up and consents that it may go over until to-morrow, if any other business is desired to be taken up by the Senate, and he made the suggestion to the Senator from Maine that he might go on with the urgent deficiency appropriation bill to-day.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am willing to yield for an appropriation bill, but not for any other purpose.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; the Senator consents that the Senator from Maine may go on with the appropriation bill. So it is of the smallest possible consequence, so far as the debate is concerned, whether the Senator gives his notice now and the resolution goes over until to-morrow, or goes over under a vote.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I was not aware until this morning that it was the intention of the Senator from Idaho to bring forward this resolution. I had supposed that the Senate would adhere to the custom which has hitherto prevailed in this body since I have been a member of it, to give way to appropriation bills when presented and in order for consideration. Especially had I supposed that would be so as to an appropriation bill which comes to us under the title of "urgent deficiency," providing for deficiencies pressed upon the Senate and the House of Representatives by the executive department of this Government. So I had taken no particular interest in this question. I take no special interest in it now.

It is true that I am chairman by resolution of the Senate of the Committee on Appropriations. I have some opinions and beliefs respecting what is the easiest and best method of dealing with the question of appropriating public money for the purposes of the Government. I had expected, if opportunity should be given, which I think it will be before this matter is concluded, to say a few words as to the resolution of the Senator from Idaho, and especially to call attention to some statements made by him on the 11th of December, when he addressed the Senate upon the subject, which are wholly erroneous. Among other reasons given for the transfer of the appropriations to the several committees named in the resolution he impliedly, if not directly, attributed to the Committee on Appropriations carelessness and worse than indifference as to some matters which came before that committee, having been referred to it by the Senate.

Lest another opportunity shall not occur, I shall now occupy a few moments. I supposed I had some papers here which would elucidate more fully what I propose to say. I find among the observations made by the Senator from Idaho his statement on page 133 of the RECORD of December 11, 1895, as a reason why this change should be made, the following:

A provision was slipped into that bill—

Meaning the sundry civil appropriation bill—

by the conferees, withdrawing all the public lands which were embraced within the arid region of the country from settlement until certain impossible conditions were complied with. The representatives from that section, and the Congress generally, were not aware of this provision of the law until instructions were received by the various land officers, issued by the Secretary of the Interior, some months later, to carry the law into effect.

Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Idaho is wholly at variance with the facts in the case. The provision to which he here alludes was a provision inserted in that bill in the House of Representatives—I have not the data before me and speak from recollection—after two days' debate, the Senator from Idaho then being a member of that body. Although it has been pending for days I can find no evidence of his making any observations upon the subject, though he did deal with another amendment immediately preceding it. That measure was fully considered and debated in the Senate.

It finally became a subject of controversy between the two Houses, and the Senate conference committee, representing the sentiments of the Senate, insisted that that provision should go out of the bill. We had at least three conferences upon that subject, and it was the last subject considered by the conference committee. I have not now the papers before me, and do not remember who were my associates in that conference. I think the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] was one, certainly either the Senator from Maryland or the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. Finally the provision was agreed to in this body, although the bill was delayed some weeks on account of it. The Senator from Nevada who is in my eye [Mr. STEWART] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] were both consulted as to that provision. I have now in my own handwriting in the room of the Committee on Appropriations an amendment which was put on in that conference, limiting and minimizing the power of that provision, which I submitted to the Senator from Nevada, the Senator from Colorado, and other Senators interested in that great question. So before I vote upon the resolution I desire at least to have it understood by the Senate that so far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, it has with fidelity represented the interests of the Senate as manifested by votes here upon this subject.

I called the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the mistake he had made, and asked him to read the debate and make the correction. I have waited, and no correction has been made. I should not allude to it now but for the fact that a vote is asked upon this question without debate.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, with the kind consent of the Senator from Iowa, I wish to make a statement at this point. He called my attention to what he considers a misstatement on my part, and I looked up the RECORD very carefully, and I find the RECORD bears out what I said in my speech of December 11. No one can find a word in my remarks reflecting upon the Appropriations Committee. I did say that we did not have time in which to carefully consider matters coming before the Senate; that most of the work was done in conference, and that we could not change any portion of a conference report without changing it all.

The facts in regard to the matter to which the Senator from Iowa alludes are these: A very full debate was had in the Senate on a motion of the then Senator from Colorado, Mr. Bowen. All the Senators from the Western States sustained Mr. Bowen's amendment to the appropriation bill, and it was put in. The bill then went to the House of Representatives, and that House added an amendment which practically withdrew our public lands from settlement. As the Senator from Iowa has said, he added in the conference committee a provision that the President could release those lands on his order; but that provision of the House of Representatives came to the Senate in conference, and therefore the Senate had no opportunity to discuss the conference report in regard to those public lands of the West. That is the complaint I was making. The matter went through here as a conference report and was never debated in the Senate. The first proposition of the then Senator from Colorado and the proposition which came here from the conference were very different, and my point was that we could not, under the present conditions, properly consider these matters. I did no injustice to the Senator from Iowa, and I intended to do none.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. I ask what is the question before the Senate? Is it the point of order or the merits of the case?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On the point of order made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], on which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is recognized.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, if I am debating out of order, of course I shall wait until the point of order is decided.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to say that anybody was out of order, for I am not sure that anything is ever out of order in the Senate. So far as I have been able to observe, the use of the rules is simply to delay or defeat the will of the majority when it is so desired. If they are for any other purpose, I have been unable to discover it.

I simply called attention to the fact that there was a point of order pending, on which the Chair had stated that he was prepared to rule, I supposed, of course, general debate was in order. Everything seems to be in order here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I only called attention to this question in order that it might be known what imperfect statements are often made here. The Senator from Idaho says that after a full examination he finds that the facts stated by him are borne out by the RECORD. The amendment which was offered in the Senate by the then Senator from Colorado, Mr. Bowen, was sent to the House of Representatives; it was debated by and large for two days, Representative CANNON, who was then chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, and other leading members of the Committee on Appropriations taking an active part in that debate. The House of Representatives inserted a provision after debate and upon a vote of the yeas and nays either twice or thrice taken. It was the subject of open debate in this body. It was also a subject of frequent consultation between members of the Appropriations Committee and the Senators who were especially interested in the public lands. I consulted personally every Senator then upon this floor from that region, at least all who could possibly be reached, and we undertook to save the provisions, so far as we could save them, of the amendment originally inserted by the Senate. Therefore the gravamen of the charge made by the Senator from Idaho that an amendment was slipped into an important bill affecting the public lands of the United States by a conference committee, so far from being sustained by the record, is shown to be absolutely without foundation in fact.

So I repeat that as to the conduct of the Committee on Appropriations upon these public questions they have dealt with them as best they could under the circumstances surrounding them. I do not wish to debate this question at length now. If the vote which has just been taken is any indication of the judgment and sense of the Senate upon the subject, it is probably not worth while to debate it further.

It is important, however, that this question should be settled within a reasonable time. Appropriation bills which are covered by the resolution introduced by the Senator from Idaho are coming now with frequency from the House of Representatives, and if those appropriation bills are to be properly considered in the judgment of the Senate by committees other than the Committee on Appropriations it is wise that that question should be disposed of at an early day.

For myself I should be glad if other business could intervene for a day or two at least, until we can have an opportunity of presenting such arguments as may occur to us looking to the retention of the appropriation bills by the Appropriations Committee. So if the Senator from Idaho will allow the resolution to go over for the present, I hope the Senator from Maine will call up the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and get it out of the way.

Mr. HALE. As suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I feel that that matter rests largely now with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS].

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask first for the decision on the point of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. Before that is done there will certainly be some discussion——

Mr. DUBOIS. I was willing to yield, and I offered to yield as soon as the resolution was made the unfinished business. I stated that I would do so, and I did. I hardly feel as though it rested entirely with me now, and unless we can make some agreement to conclude it——

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Idaho allow me?

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. What reason is there why the resolution can not be disposed of this afternoon? I understand that all Senators agree that the Committee on Appropriations should know precisely the status of affairs.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow a suggestion from me?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has indicated that this question was brought up unexpectedly, and he was thereby taken by surprise. He desires that it shall go over for a day or two, so that he and others may be prepared to make such remarks as they see proper on the subject. It seems to me, under the circumstances, when the chairman of the committee makes such a request, it is only reasonable that the Senate should grant it.

Mr. MILLS. Why not let the Chair decide the question of the point of order, and then we can take up that matter?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know that I have any objection to that.

Mr. MILLS. That might come up to-morrow. Let us have the question of order decided now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to determine the question of order, but is willing to hear the suggestions of Senators. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, it is important, it seems to me, that this question, if it is to be decided, should be decided properly for the future guidance of the Senate.

I remember on a notable occasion, when I was in charge for the Committee on Rules of an amendment to the rules closing debate, and while a resolution for that purpose was pending, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], representing his side of the Chamber, raised the question that the notice given by me, which was given in writing, stating specifically the items required by the rule which I have read, was not explicit and definite enough, for the reason that it did not set forth the purposes for which the amendment of the rules was to be adopted, and his claim in that regard was sustained by the unanimous vote of every Senator sitting upon the other side of the Chamber. His claim was that that resolution was not in order because the notice which I had given in writing was not sufficiently explicit in regard to the purposes of the amendment to the rules.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. There is no question but what this resolution is amply specific. It covers every portion of the rule desired to be amended.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the Senator fails to understand this question or this rule.

Mr. HILL. I think I understand it.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator seems to think——

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will allow me a moment, a Senator proceeds, in writing or otherwise, to give notice that on a certain day he intends to make a motion to amend a rule of the Senate, and if he does not specify particularly in advance the precise amendment to be offered, so that Senators may understand it, of course when it is brought up it is subject to the objection that it must be specific and show the precise rule to be amended. That is an entirely different proposition from this. Here the notice is in the form of a resolution, a solemn notice given, specifying particularly the precise rule and all the details of it, so that anyone may perfectly understand it.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from New York is talking about a question that is not before the Senate. He is talking about something which I can not comprehend.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator is giving us a precedent which he wants the Presiding Officer to follow, he should give one that is analogous to the point, not a defective notice that did not sufficiently specify the rule, and that was ruled out substantially by a unanimous vote, and has nothing to do with this question, which is a formal resolution containing the notice specifically of the thing to be amended.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from New York fails to understand me and fails to understand the rule, which seems to be very plain and explicit in its nature. In the case to which I have alluded there was no question of a notice, because the notice was filed, and it was filed in writing. It stated explicitly the rule that was proposed to be amended, and stated the purpose of the amendment. That is an entirely different question from this, where no notice whatever has been filed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator will excuse me while I state my own position.

In this case no notice whatever has been given, as was plainly required by the rule. Let me read the rule to the Senator from New York:

> No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing—

What? Not an ordinary notice of an amendment to be proposed, but—> specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof.

Has any such notice whatever been given in this case?

Mr. HILL. About sixty-one days' notice has been given.

Mr. ALDRICH. Where has any such notice been given?

Mr. HILL. In the resolution itself.

Mr. ALDRICH. The rule requires notice to be given outside of the resolution itself.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator answer this question——

Mr. ALDRICH. I should prefer to go on for at least one minute consecutively and state my own position.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island declines to be interrupted.

Mr. ALDRICH. We have other rules in this body which provide that no resolution or motion shall be in order on the day when presented, if objected to. We have other provisions in the rules requiring unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of questions at various times; but this is an entirely different rule, and applies only to one class of motions and resolutions, which is amendments to the rules themselves. We have a rule which provides that one objection shall carry a resolution over to the succeeding day, as the Senator from Massachusetts has already well said. If that were the only purpose of the rule, it would be entirely useless; but this rule has another and an entirely different reason. A motion, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, can never be its own notice, but there must be, in addition to that notice, in addition to the language of the resolution itself, a notice in writing setting forth specifically the rules to be changed and the purpose for which they are to be changed.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask whether it is not true that the rules have been repeatedly amended where the motion to amend being put in and laid over one day was its own notice?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have never heard, during my fourteen years' service in the Senate, of a single instance of that kind.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator yield to me to ask one question for information?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. More than a year ago I offered an amendment to the rules, which was sent to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HILL. And is there yet.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to ask the Senator from Rhode Island if it is not competent for that committee to report that amendment back and take action upon it?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not for the committee to take action.

Mr. GALLINGER. For the Senate to take action. If so, what becomes of the notice in writing?

Mr. ALDRICH. The motion which the Senator made a year ago was in another Congress, and would not apply now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Suppose it had been offered on the first day of the present Congress, might not the Committee on Rules report that back to the Senate and act upon it?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think the Committee on Rules or a Senator could make a motion to suspend the rules without giving the notice required by the rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offered an amendment to the rules and it went to the Committee on Rules. Is it not competent for the committee to report that back to the Senate, and competent for the Senate to take action upon it without other notice?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think not. It would be a plain violation of the rule to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a most extraordinary thing.

Mr. CHANDLER. I differ with the Senator in what has taken place, and in nine cases out of ten, in all cases, so far as I remember, a resolution to amend the rules has been its own notice. It has gone over one day and the rule has been complied with.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator had been as observant about this as about many other things, he would have known that no such action has ever taken place.

Mr. CHANDLER. I place my recollection against that of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the mere matter of the passage of a resolution in the shape of an amendment to the rules in this body, covering the points it does, is a very serious matter, and ought not to be adopted by the Senate without due deliberation. Such a rule is not for to-day, nor to run through this Congress, but in all probability to establish the rule of government of this body, which ought to be thoroughly deliberated upon before we adopt it. Such a rule has been tried elsewhere, and it has been discussed not only here, but elsewhere. It is a very serious matter, one that will deeply affect the interest of the country in all probability, and there are strong reasons which ought to be presented to the Senate, and properly weighed, before we act upon this proposition.

But aside from that, Mr. President, the question now pending, in the shape of a point of order before the Chair, is one of greater consideration than the resolution itself. The proposed amendment to the rules would involve dollars and cents and probably extravagance in the expenditure of the people's money; but that could be corrected. The other question that is pending for your decision, sir, is one of greater importance. Our rules have been made for the purpose of protecting minorities and checking majorities in this body, and preventing them from trampling on the rights of individual Senators and of the rights of States of the Union.

There is scarcely a rule from the beginning to the end of our code which has not been framed with a view to restrain hasty action. Those rules have been tested in the past in times of excitement. There never has been up for consideration a question where section was involved, where great interests were involved, that the majority of this body has not attempted to change the rules, precisely as is being attempted now upon this proposition, and there never has been a case, no matter how great the excitement and how sharp the division, where the Presiding Officer of this body and the majority of the Senate have not agreed that as to a change of the rules, written notice is a necessary prerequisite to such resolutions, and they have never been considered until that notice has been given in writing.

There was a time within the past four years when there was not a member of the Senate upon this side of the Chamber who was not prepared to stay here until the end of the Congressional term and obstruct every item of business in Congress rather than to have a rule adopted in the shape in which this rule is now proposed to be adopted. When that excitement was at its height, with a majority on the other side of the Chamber, by the action, as it was understood, of a caucus or a conference, an attempt was made to change the rules so as to stifle debate, and yet even in the midst of that excitement, with the desire which prevailed to cut off debate and to force party measures through, there was no Senator on the other side who would go so far as to attempt to change the rules without the written notice required, and there is not an instance in the history of the Government where it has been attempted.

The distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], who is recognized as the best parliamentarian in the body and one of the best in the country, made for us on this side of the Chamber a written argument, the clearest that has ever been presented to the Senate of the United States, so clear that there was no partisan on the other side who would attempt to controvert it, and it was in that great hour of excitement and distress admitted on both sides that he was right. The precedents of the Senate are all one way. The Senator from Rhode Island, who had been given charge by his party friends of an attempt to force a change of the rules, gave notice in writing, as will be found in the Journal of the Senate of December 29 of that year. The notice was full, but when it came up for consideration the Senator from Tennessee raised the point of order for us, every Democrat sustaining him, that even that notice, full as it was, was not sufficiently specific to give every Senator notice of the change that was proposed, and on that we fought. The Chair decided that, the notice having been given, in his judgment it was all that Rule XL required, and we divided on party lines in the discussion of that question, but not as to the notice itself, for there never has been any serious question in this body that the notice in writing was not required. It was only upon the minor point of whether it fully complied with Rule XL.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. GORMAN. With great pleasure.

Mr. HILL. The Senator cites that precedent, as I understand, simply for the purpose of showing that a notice is one way to suggest an amendment, and the ruling was that the notice was defective. Has not the Senate entertained resolution after resolution, discussed them, and referred them to the Committee on Rules for the purpose of having the committee act upon them? Does the Senator now mean to state that if the committee should, in its wisdom, see fit to report another amendment than the one now before it, the Senate could not take up that report and act upon it? I should like to hear an answer to that question.

Mr. GORMAN. The rule is intended, and has been so construed from the beginning, and no parliamentarian has ever questioned it, to restrict Senators like the Senator from New York and myself, who are somewhat impulsive, from introducing to-day a resolution to amend the rules, and by getting up an excitement to-morrow induce the Senate to vote to pass it. That rule is intended to prohibit such action.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I ask if all the excitement could not be gotten up as well by a notice as by a resolution?

Mr. GORMAN. Possibly, but that is the rule.

Now the Senator propounds another question to me. He wants to know if this resolution had gone to the Committee on Rules whether, if it had been reported back, it could have been acted upon by the Senate. This comes in on a different rule. There is a general law that governs this body—deliberation and time for consideration. It goes to one of the eyes of the Senate, a committee, and they report it back, with the reasons for the proposed change, after notice and fair consideration.

Mr. HILL. Did they give any reasons?

Mr. GORMAN. As a matter of course, they gave reasons. The Committee on Rules of the body reported an entire change of the rules. That has been the custom of the body, and there is sound reasoning for it.

As to the mere matter of getting charge of appropriation bills and distributing them among various committees, I care nothing, except as affecting the general interests of the country. That is a matter which I think ought to be discussed, and fully and fairly discussed, after proper notice given.

The decision of the Senate, if it is otherwise than I have indicated, will make a precedent that will come home to Senators on both sides of the Chamber to trouble them. To-day we are in the minority in this body and may be in a smaller minority in the next Congress.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will allow me, is the minority any better protected by the giving of a notice than by the offering of a resolution?

Mr. GORMAN. I think so.

Mr. HILL. In what respect?

Mr. GORMAN. And the history of a hundred years has taught us so. I believe there is something in the history of the past. I believe that a rule or a law which has operated fairly to protect the minority ought not to be changed hastily. But, Mr. President, if this rule be established here to-day, the mere desire to get the control of appropriation bills for some other committee than the Committee on Appropriations, it will plague the Senate and plague the country. I am one of those who believe that this body, constituted as it is, with its rigid and restrictive rules, as they are, is the only security for legislation which will protect the interests of the minority in the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to ask the Senator if I understood him correctly to say that it is competent for the Committee on Rules to report back an amendment offered in open Senate and for action to be taken upon it?

Mr. GORMAN. I think that that question has never been raised.

Mr. GALLINGER. But I think the Senator expressed the opinion very definitely that that could be done.

Mr. GORMAN. I say that in my recollection it has been done. I think an entire change of the rules of the Senate has been reported by the Committee on Rules, possibly without the written notice required.

Mr. GALLINGER. The only other point I desire to make is that the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Maine say that it can not be done; so even those who are arguing for this strict construction of the rules do not agree.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not care to express an opinion beyond what I have stated.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it can be done.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me, I desire to say that there has been one general revision of the rules since I have been a member of the Committee on Rules. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] was then chairman of the committee; and, speaking now from a memory that goes back quite a good many years, my recollection is that he submitted, many days before the revision was taken up for consideration, a written report showing precisely what changes had been proposed, or why proposed to be made, and the various rules then in existence that were proposed to be modified, changed, or abandoned.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, upon reflection I think the Senator from Tennessee is correct. I was a minority member of the Committee on Rules at the time the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] was the chairman. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and Senator (afterwards President) Harrison were members of the committee, as I now remember. I believe the Senator from Tennessee is correct. The report was made.

I trust the Senator who has charge of this important matter—for it is a very important matter—and all Senators will agree that it is better in every instance that we shall comply with the rule requiring notice. That will only cause the Senator one day's delay. Then the rule can come up upon its merits for discussion. This will save the danger of making a precedent which will in all probability trouble us on both sides hereafter. Then this matter can come up for proper discussion and deliberation. There are reasons which may be urged on both sides, but let us determine the question as it ought to be determined in the interests of the Senate and in the interests of the country.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the objection raised by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr ALDRICH] puts both the Senate and the Chair in a very awkward predicament, as I understand it, one from which the Chair has no power to relieve the Senate, or the Senate to relieve the Chair, except by a reconsideration of the vote which has just been taken that we will consider the motion for amendment. The Senate has just voted, on a yea-and-nay vote, that it will proceed to the consideration of the resolution for the amendment of the rules.

Who is going to reverse that action? Who is going to hold that it is illegitimate, that it is null and void, and that a rule of the Senate, subject, as we see here, to various interpretations, can be so construed now that the Chair is obliged to hold, or will hold, that the vote just taken by the Senate on a call of the yeas and nays, more than two-thirds, I believe, voting for consideration, shall be annulled and held for naught and that we shall stand where we stood at the time this motion was introduced? Now, from that category there is no escape at all except that the Chair shall be held to have power to annul and set aside a vote of the Senate or else, through a motion, to reconsider our vote.

At the time this motion was brought up for consideration it was open to any Senator to make the objection which the Senator from Rhode Island makes after the consideration has been agreed to. Whose fault is it that no objection was made to the consideration of the motion to amend the rules? It is the fault of every Senator on this floor who feels any interest in the question, and even those who do not, for it is our duty to stand upon the rules, and to be vigilant in seeing that they are not violated or set aside upon any occasion.

The Chair could not raise the question for two reasons. First of all, it is not the province of the Chair, perhaps, without a suggestion, he not being a member of this body, but only the President of it, to suggest to Senators what their duty is in regard to the management of the business on the floor of the Senate. The second reason is that the proposition to amend the rule itself contains substantially a notice of what is intended to be accomplished by the action of the Senate. Scarcely anything could be more specific than that, and it would be a work of supererogation if not of folly by a written notice to announce in the Senate that "on a certain day, or hereafter when the Senate will give its consent, I shall proceed to ask the Senate to pass the amendment," two papers giving notice when only one is necessary.

Now, if the motion itself which is made to amend the rules contains the precise designation of the part of the rule which is intended to be changed, then that, I understand, is a compliance with Rule XL of our standing rules. This motion does contain all that, and puts in quotation marks the parts of the rule intended to be changed.

Who can be mistaken as to the intention of the mover of the resolution? Who can be misled at all in regard to the motion he intends or the particular language of the rule that is proposed to be changed? Nobody. So take it as an open question, if you please, if the question were now for the first time suggested, the rule is not violated, but it is complied with substantially and fully by the form of the motion which the Senator from Idaho has submitted here. But when the Senate neglects to make an objection when the question is laid before the body, as to whether or not we will proceed to the consideration of the resolution, and a vote by yeas and nays is taken upon it, and it is agreed to, it certainly is too late for anybody to undertake to reverse the action of the Senate by a mere decision. There is no power in this world which can reverse that action except the Senate itself, upon a motion to reconsider.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it seems to me that there are two phases of this matter, wholly distinct. What is the true rule, if all possible objections are made at the proper time, and can any objection be waived. The first question involves a construction of Rule XL as it is written.

Now, I will say preliminarily, that I see no danger in adopting the rule contended for by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] and those upon this floor who concur with him. First, what is the object of Rule XL? It is that every Senator shall have at least one day's notice of a proposed change in a definite certain rule. He shall not only be informed that an amendment is proposed to Rule I, II, or III, but he shall be advised of the particulars of that amendment. That is the object. That notice has been given; that knowledge is had. There is not a Senator upon this floor who does not know the specific object had in view by the Senator from Idaho, because the resolution embodies each particular and places it in language so clear that misapprehension is entirely impossible.

In the next place, it can not be that the safety of the Senate or of the country depends upon the mere question whether notice is given by resolution or by a notice which is called a notice. As the Senator from New York has well said, one day's notice in writing is admitted to be enough, and why is there any safety in a particular form of notice, so styled, and why is it that there is no safety in a resolution which contains every essential of a notice?

Why did the Senator from Idaho present to the Senate a resolution, "Resolved, That so and so be done," unless it was that he sought the approval of the Senate upon that resolution? Is it not peculiar reasoning, to say the least, that the Senate supposed that the Senator from Idaho did not intend to ask for a change of the rules of the Senate? Is there anyone who has read the resolution or has heard it read whose intellectuality is in such condition that he did not understand the object of the Senator from Idaho? Can it be that our rules, in which are supposed to be embodied the wisdom of the ages, are so framed that they compel us to admit that we did not understand this plain language proffered here by the Senator from Idaho and remaining upon our desks for perhaps two months? The Senator from Idaho went so far that before the adjournment of the last Congress he told us what he intended to do or would try to do; and he has simply followed out his programme.

Now, outside of that proposition, outside of the fact, as I believe, that the Senator from Idaho has complied with Rule XL, there is the question of waiver. Does anyone contend that when a provision of law is made for his benefit as to a notice, he can not waive that notice? Does he pretend that if a certain time is prescribed, given him as of right, within which, if he sees fit, he may not appear before a judicial tribunal, his earlier appearance and submission of himself for judgment would not be a waiver of that notice?

Now, what could the Senate do here to-day? Let us take the common-sense view of the situation, if we possibly can under our rules. We were confronted with this condition of things. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] rose and stated that he desired to have the Senate consider the urgent deficiency bill. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] stated that he wished the Senate to take up his resolution. We learned, as the result of some talk between Senators, that the Senator from Maine conceded that if a vote were taken at once the whole matter might be submitted to the sense of the Senate. No one dissented. The question whether we would take up the urgent deficiency appropriation bill was submitted to a vote, the yeas and nays were called upon it, and taken; and the Senate rendered its judgment against taking it up. With equal solemnity and without the slightest objection upon the part of anyone, we proceeded to vote upon the proposition whether we should take up the resolution of the Senator from Idaho. The Senate voted upon that issue, and by more than a two-thirds vote, as stated by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], it decided to take up the resolution.

Where were the objectors then? When the question was submitted to the Senate whether or not it would take up the resolution of the Senator from Idaho, who raised any objection? No one. By unanimous consent that question was submitted to the judgment of the Senate. No one objected; the Senate voted upon it; and having voted upon it, and agreed to it, the Senator from Idaho, turning to the Senator from Maine, stated that he would yield the floor to the Senator from Maine in order that the urgent deficiency appropriation bill might be taken up, the resolution of the Senator from Idaho remaining the unfinished business. The Senator from Maine stated that he did not wish, under the circumstances, to follow out that idea, but preferred that the whole subject should be determined then. So the Senator from Idaho proceeded to present his resolution; and there we are.

Now we are told that although we voted, without a solitary question being raised about it, on the question whether or not we should go on, having decided by a two-thirds vote of this body that we should go on, we shall have a ruling that we shall not go on, and that although two-thirds of this body have so decided without any antecedent objection, we are powerless to proceed.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator from California, as he has referred to what I stated, that I had no disposition to debate the question. The matter came up hurriedly. I had the same feeling then that I have now, but as I stated, I was not speaking for the committee. I was not speaking for any other person. I had no desire to debate; I do not have any desire to debate now. Members of the Committee on Appropriations, its chairman and others, have expressed a desire to debate the question. What I said for myself ought not in any way to be taken as concluding them.

It is a great subject; it is involved with great consequences, deep, profound consequences; and if other Senators wish to debate it not unreasonably—not in any way for delay, but simply to express themselves—certainly they ought to have that privilege. I do not think the Senator in charge of the resolution has any desire to cut off debate.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Maine surely has not so misconceived my remarks as to infer that I deny the right of Senators to discuss this question. I certainly could not cut them off if I desired, and I have no such wish. I was not discussing that question at all.

Mr. HALE. I did not want the Senator to quote me as concluding anybody else in a disposition to come at once to a vote. I said then that I spoke for nobody else.

Mr. WHITE. As we say when we quote a judge whose opinion is not conclusive or an eminent man whose judgment is not determinative, I referred to the Senator from Maine merely because of my respect for him and the knowledge I have that he stands well in the Senate, deservedly, as a judge of such a situation.

The reason which the Senator gives for his course in the matter explains his own action, but every other Senator did the same thing. There is such a thing as estoppel by conduct. We all sat here and agreed that the question should be submitted to a vote, and now we are to say that we have no power under that agreement. Mr. President, I deny that any such conclusion is justified by the rules of this body.

Now, the remark of the Senator from Maine calls to my mind another subject. There is no fear of curtailment of debate upon this question. The simple issue is, shall we proceed to consider the subject? We can consider it, and consider it, and consider it; we can deliberate, and deliberate, and deliberate, according to the immemorial customs and usages of the Senate, until the proposed rule shall have passed away into the obscurity to which has been condemned many a similar effort of those who have sought to bring about needed changes in the procedure of this body.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, in the course of the debate a matter has come up with regard to the conduct of the Committee on Appropriations upon a very memorable occasion, and as I have been alluded to and as I know the facts intimately, I wish to say a word as to the matter.

The Bowen amendment provided an appropriation for irrigation. It was put on the bill in the Senate, and it went to the other House and was there amended. A provision was inserted which conferred upon the Department power to withdraw practically all lands from sale. I was over in the other House at the time the debate took place there, and I was very much opposed to such an amendment; but it was passed. It came into conference, and the chairman of the committee, Mr. ALLISON, invited myself and several other Senators from the Pacific Coast—I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was one—before the committee of conference. We were very much opposed to it.

They delayed it for a considerable time. Finally there was a slight modification, which we thought would be conceded, requiring the Department to reverse the drastic method which the language of the bill as it came from the other House would warrant. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] did all he could to relieve the amendment of what we feared would be the construction of it, and we got a slight amendment; but when the Department came to construe it they tied up the lands, closed up the land offices, and created a great deal of trouble. After that we had a very great contest to open the land offices again, lasting here for a week or two and resulting in a very warm debate.

I say this in justice to the Appropriations Committee, and particularly to the chairman. He did what he could to relieve us from a very awkward and injurious situation.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay the decision of the Chair, but as it is appropriate that I should speak now, if at all, I wish to state that the charge made against the Committee on Appropriations is without the slightest foundation in the world.

The amendment complained of was put on in the other House, as stated by the chairman of the committee, after an extended debate. When it came here the Senate refused to accept the amendment, and the matter went to a conference committee. When the conference met I went in person before the committee to protest against the House provision. Other Senators who were interested in the Western country also went before the committee. None of us, however, at that time believed it possible to give the House provision the construction that was afterwards given to it and which, in my judgment, was a forced construction and an improper one. After some considerable time, and after two or three meetings of the conference committee, the House of Representatives insisting upon their amendment, they finally consented to a modification, and we believed then that with that modification, if the Department itself had any desire to enforce the then existing law, there would be no trouble about it.

But when the matter got into the Department, unfortunately the Department was imbued with the idea that the thing for the United States Government to do was to maintain and keep the title of all its public lands; that the Government had been giving away land to people who had been getting rich on the public lands in the West by making farms, which after a lifetime had become worth, perhaps, ten or fifteen dollars an acre; that it ought not to be done any more; and that they would give the law a construction which would practically and effectively repeal every one of the settlement laws. And that is what they did.

There was nobody in this body who was responsible for that condition. The Senate knew what was being done, and it sustained the committee so long as there was any probability that we could get a concession from the House; and when we could not get that concession we thought we had a modification that would let us out. The Department then put this construction upon the law, and one hundred and twenty-eight or one hundred and thirty thousand people attempted to enter lands before the next meeting of Congress. They were told by the Department, after the offices had been opened and they had been allowed to make their claims and settle on the land, that they could get no title whatever.

Then there began a controversy again between the Senate and the House of Representatives concerning the matter. We could not secure such legislation as was required except we secured it on an appropriation bill. An amendment was put upon one of the appropriation bills that would validate all of those entries and, I will say, compel the administration of public affairs to recognize their right under the theretofore existing law. That became then a matter of controversy between the two Houses. I state what is pretty well known by members of the committee when I say that the Senate was held here at that time for two weeks to settle the question.

I went before the conference committee repeatedly, and so did other Senators. We represented the great harm that was being done to settlers in the West, but the other House, or at least some members of the House, had got an idea that that was a great thing to do in order to preserve the forests and the lands for the next generation. They adhered to the condition that existed, and declined to accept the Senate amendment. When it was evident to the members of the other House, and only when it was evident to them, that an extra session would be called if that provision was not allowed to remain in the appropriation bill, did they allow it to remain.

That can not be charged against the Appropriations Committee, Mr. President. I do not now believe that any other committee could have done more service for the people of the West than that committee did. Great pressure was brought to bear on the committee to waive the objection and leave us in that condition, but the committee, I am glad to say, with one voice, supported always by an overwhelming vote of the Senate when the question was presented to this body, insisted that the restriction or the forced interpretation should be waived by a provision of law or there would be no appropriation bill and an extra session would be called. Under that threat, that feeling, with that knowledge, and with that alone, we did secure such legislation as validated the 120,000 or 130,000 entries and prevented that rule from being applied thereafter.

Mr. DUBOIS. I hardly think Senators are fair to me. They have not heard the debate.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know what the Senator from Idaho said. I admit that I was not present when he spoke, and I mean no reflection upon the Senator. I was merely stating what I know to be the fact.

Mr. DUBOIS. If there is anything contained in these remarks——

Mr. TELLER. Wait a moment. I do not know that the Senator has reflected upon the committee. Only I supposed he had from what I heard here. I wish to state that there is no reason why anyone should reflect upon the committee, whether the Senator did or did not.

Mr. STEWART. I have no intention to reflect upon the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], and I am in the same position that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] occupies. I did not hear what the Senator from Idaho said, but from the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] I supposed that he had been wrongfully accused in this particular case. I thought if there had been any blame attached to him in this particular case a statement ought to be made.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that the line of argument now being followed would come properly upon the resolution rather than upon the point of order.

Mr. DUBOIS. I desire to make a personal statement. I was trying to show in my argument that too much was left to the conferees in the closing days of the session. I will read from my own language:

> In the hurry and rush of the closing days it is almost impossible to tell what a conference report includes or means, and it is practically impossible, through fear of an extra session, to prevent the adoption of the report of the conferees.

We have to accept the whole report or none of it. I was speaking to that point solely.

Now, the conferees of the Senate put in the sundry civil bill the provision which withdrew those lands from settlement. The Senate did not do it; it refused to do it.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Idaho is wrong about that matter. The House of Representatives put it in.

Mr. DUBOIS. I understand.

Mr. TELLER. It was not done by the committee in the House, but by the House itself.

Mr. DUBOIS. I understand distinctly that the other House voted it in. The Senate never voted it in, but the conferees of the Senate agreed to its staying in the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say to the Senator that it was submitted to the Senate——

Mr. DUBOIS. But they would not have it; they refused it.

Mr. TELLER. No. The Senate refused to accept it as long as they could. When it was found that the other House would consent only to the modification that the committee did make (I was not then a member of the committee), the Senate consented to it. There was full knowledge on the part of every Western Senator, no matter what the others may have known, as to what was in the bill.

Mr. DUBOIS. There is no question about that at all; but we were then confronted with an extra session or we had to let this go. I was speaking in this connection about the conferees.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Idaho allow me? I do not wish to prolong the debate, but the Senator will observe that the statement in his remarks to which he refers is that the conferees, without the knowledge of the two Houses, stealthily put into the bill a provision which withdrew all public lands from settlement. That is the substance of it.

Now, all I desire is that it shall be shown, as it can be, that the particular amendment to which the Senator alludes was one that was well known in both branches and largely discussed in both Houses, and never was agreed to by the conferees until all those Senators who were interested in the subject agreed that it should go in, for the reason that it was a question whether that provision should be put in or the appropriation of $250,000, or whatever it was, should be stricken out of the bill. So I submit to the Senator from Idaho that it is fair at least to the conferees on the part of the Senate that the facts should be known in the face of the statement of the Senator made on the 11th of December last.

Mr. DUBOIS. I desire to state that I had no intention whatever of reflecting upon the Appropriations Committee. In fact, I was very careful in my remarks to disclaim any such intention, and I did not have that purpose in mind in making those remarks. I was speaking to the point that the conferees were charged with most of the legislation on appropriation bills. I wish it distinctly understood that I intended no reflection upon the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, the argument on the point of order is the refinement of technicality, and it is therefore necessary that the nicest attention should be given to the words employed in the rule. I desire to point out that Rule XL has no application to the question now under consideration, and because we have no motion to change the rules pending before us.

The rules draw a distinction, which I think every parliamentarian will recognize, between a resolution and a motion. This is the case of a resolution. The rules provide that every resolution must lie over one day before it can be considered unless there be unanimous consent to its immediate consideration. When a resolution has gone over it comes up for consideration on the next day, and if not disposed of it goes to the Calendar like a bill or joint resolution, and then must be taken up on a motion for its consideration.

Now, this is not a resolution. It is a motion. But for this rule a motion to change the rules might be made before the Senate at any time. Various motions are made from day to day before the Senate. The rule interposes then with reference to a motion to change the rules the same necessity for delay that is interposed in the case of a proposal for action or change of the rules by resolution. Thus, therefore, this rule, which relates only to motions, has no reference to the proceeding now before the Senate, which is the consideration (and the Senate upon a yea-and-nay vote has voted to consider it) of a resolution which, since a resolution must be in writing in order to lie over, must, from the very nature of the case, contain all that a notice of a motion could contain or would be required to contain under the fortieth rule.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Wisconsin be good enough to state again his distinction between a motion and a resolution?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is what I rose to ask him. I hope before he gets through he will state where a motion stops and where a resolution begins.

Mr. VILAS. The distinction is plain. A resolution is submitted in writing and must lie over in its form of a written proposal for action one day.

Mr. ALDRICH. Can a motion be submitted in writing?

Mr. VILAS. A motion may be verbal. A motion is not necessarily submitted in writing. A motion being made is for immediate consideration, unless there be some rule of the Senate which requires its consideration to be delayed. Every day motions are addressed to the Chair. They are recorded by the clerks. Of course, it would be entirely competent for a Senator to put his motion into written form before he makes it, but it is not necessary that it should be so. It was the purpose of the fortieth rule to provide that if any Senator chose to attempt to amend the rules by a verbal motion for that purpose, it should be preceded by a statement of the purpose and of the details of particulars of the proposed amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the twenty-first rule, which says that—

> All motions shall be reduced to writing, if desired by the Presiding Officer or by any Senator, and shall be read before the same shall be debated.

A motion would cease to be a motion and become a resolution, according to the Senator's argument, if the President of the Senate or any Senator should require the mover to reduce it to writing.

Mr. VILAS. Not at all. That rule shows that what I stated in respect to a motion is true. It is to be made presumptively in the first place verbally, ore tenus. If the Presiding Officer or any Senator, in order that there should be no mistake about its terms, requires it to be put in writing, then the Senator moving must put it so; and here comes this rule with respect to a motion to effect a change or amendment in the rules and requires that it always shall be so, or at least if not so that it shall be preceded by a formal notice specifying the exact particulars of the proposed change.

I am only speaking of this, Mr. President, as a mere question of law, and interesting for the extreme refinement of argument to which the discussion has gone.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope before the Senator from Wisconsin sits down he will state just what the difference is between a resolution and a motion if both were in writing. Suppose a resolution is written out and a motion is written out, where does the difference come in?

Mr. VILAS. We all know perfectly well that a resolution begins in a certain form. If it is a concurrent resolution it has a certain form of words; if it is a joint resolution it has certain other forms of words; if it is a resolution for the action of the Senate alone it may be simply a resolve. A written motion is but the expression in writing of a motion that could be made verbally, and it would be enough to say, "I move that such and such an act be done, or that such and such an order be made by the Senate."

Mr. ALDRICH. A resolution may be changed into a motion, then, by leaving out the word "resolved" at the beginning, or, vice versa, a motion can be made into a resolution by writing the word "resolved," and the rules could be evaded, according to the notion of the Senator from Wisconsin, by changing the form.

Mr. VILAS. So far from that being true, if a Senator chooses to make his proposal for an amendment of the rules of the Senate, as did the Senator from Idaho, in the form of a resolution, he necessarily complies with the full purpose of the fortieth rule, because, if any one objects, his resolution must lie over for a day. It does lie over for a day, under the rules, unless there is unanimous consent. Upon the very face of the resolution every object of the fortieth rule is particularly carried out by the precise specification of what has been done and the purpose of the motion.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I do not propose to speak any further upon the question of parliamentary law involved. It has been sufficiently elucidated. I think it must be clear that the Senate has a right to proceed to do precisely what it is now doing, to consider the pending resolution on its merits.

Allow me to say, in the first instance, that I shall support this resolution not because of anything done or omitted to be done by the Committee on Appropriations. Neither should the distinguished chairman, for whom we all have great respect, nor any other member of the committee construe this proposition as any reflection upon the committee. It is not, any more than it could be said an enlargement of a committee was a reflection upon any member of the committee. The majority of this body proceeded to enlarge several of the committees. Was it any reflection upon the past actions of the committee? None whatever. It is simply in pursuance of a general policy.

Mr. President, this proposition is not a new one. It has been suggested many times before. It is simply following out the precedent set in the House of Representatives. We heard the same dire predictions made years ago that it would increase appropriations and that calamity would befall the country if the various appropriation bills were diversified and distributed to the appropriate committees. I appeal to history to show that those predictions have not been fulfilled.

I have listened in vain for any argument against this resolution on the merits, stripped of the suggestion that it is to be construed as a reflection upon this committee. Laying aside that proposition, what argument has been advanced? I read the speech of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], made on the very day the Senator from Idaho advanced this proposition in the Senate. He had been a member of the Senate for a long number of years, and he listened to that speech holding this proposition in his hand. He simply pointed out two particulars in which he thought it might be well enough not to allow the resolution to apply, namely, to the Army appropriations and to the naval affairs. If a Senator who has been so long a member of this body, when a proposition of this kind has been proposed, can point to simply two changes that he thought might be required to be made, I think the resolution is pretty well founded, and that we can with great appropriateness proceed to adopt it.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is in charge of the whole subject of agriculture. It knows its wants; it knows its requirements; its members have given all their time to that subject; they know the moneys necessary for it. Will some one tell me why that committee is not as competent as the Committee on Appropriations to tell what amount of money the Department of Agriculture should have? It strikes me all the argument, all the reasoning, is with this resolution, namely, that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry should be the committee to say what appropriation shall be made for the Agricultural Department.

Take the Committee on Foreign Relations. Are not the members of that committee engaged in the very subject of investigating what should be done in reference to our foreign affairs, our consular affairs? Is not the whole question of salaries of our representatives abroad a question for that committee? Ought not the subject of appropriations to be referred to that committee? What argument, what point can be made against it? It does not require, let me tell you, days of consideration to enable Senators to antagonize this proposition. If there is any argument against it it ought to occur to them the very moment the proposition is submitted.

Mr. President, there is none. The suggestion of delay is simply a part of the tactics by which to defeat the resolution. We might as well be plain about it. All this question of parliamentary law, all the suggestions that have been made are simply for the purpose of delay, in my humble opinion, because the question is so clear.

Take the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, of which the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is chairman. We have with us as a member of that committee an ex-member of the Cabinet, a man who was for nearly four years Postmaster-General, and is familiar with the whole subject of post-office matters, and the moneys required for that service. That committee can more appropriately than any other committee dispose of that question. Why can not that committee be trusted? Why should that committee be simply confined to the confirmation of post-office nominations? All other bills relating to post-offices go to that committee. Why should not the moneys necessary to be appropriated go to that committee, too?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL. Why not?

Mr. HOAR. I do not rise to interfere with the Senator from New York because he has gone on so far in his argument, but I desire to give notice that after he concludes I shall insist upon the discussion being confined to the question of order until that is settled. I did not rise to interfere with the Senator, but I give notice that after he gets through I shall make the point.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I will proceed further with my argument. I have already said that I regard the question of order as substantially disposed of. The propriety of this resolution is now the only question involved here, in my judgment.

There is a committee established on coast defenses. It is proceeding to consider all the bills relating to coast-defense matters. Yet do you say that that committee ought not to have before it the appropriation bill which determines the amount of money that shall be expended for fortifications? That committee gives its entire time to that subject. How can the Committee on Appropriations, able as it is, and composed of some of the ablest and most experienced members of this body, know more upon this subject than the members of that committee can know?

Take the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said—of course there was no question about it—that the Committee on the District of Columbia ought to have charge of the question of appropriations for the District of Columbia. Who can make an argument upon the other side of this question? There is none. All the bills relating to sewers, the opening of streets, and the civil government of the District of Columbia belong to that committee, because the Congress is substantially the common council of the District of Columbia. That is what it is in fact; and yet when it comes to the appropriation of moneys, the Committee on the District of Columbia, which has had all these subjects before it, has nothing whatever to say, but the Committee on Appropriations determines that question. Take the Committee on Pensions. Who can argue that that committee should not have charge of the moneys necessary to appropriate for pensions? It will not take them very long.

Mr. President, there is no reflection upon the Committee on Appropriations intended. Have we forgotten the speech of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] when he expressly disclaimed that there was any reflection intended upon the committee. Let me read from the speech of the Senator from Idaho when he first presented this proposition. He said:

> A reference to the personnel of the Appropriations Committee as at present constituted will convince any unprejudiced mind that other duties demand so much of their time and thought that they can not do justice to the country, the Senate, or themselves in attempting to supervise all the appropriations of the Government. They are the foremost men of the Senate, as I have stated, and the country looks to them as leaders in debate. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] or the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is the chairman. No matter what subject of importance is under consideration, the country and the Senate expect them to participate. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] are universally recognized as among the ablest debaters on this floor, and their attention and services are required at all times. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] are so conspicuous for their ability and eloquence that the country has a right to expect and does receive the benefit of their counsel on all general legislation. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is conceded to be among the best equipped men in public life, and in addition he is the recognized leader of nearly one-half this side of the Chamber on the currency question, if not of the entire Senate. His judgment is always in demand. And—> so it is with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE]; they are expected to and do take an active interest in all general legislation.
> Last but not least—

Mr. President, there was certainly no intention to cast any reflection upon these distinguished gentlemen. They are conceded to be among the best equipped men of the Senate. Their time is greatly occupied in the transaction of the business of that committee, and therefore it seems proper that the appropriation bills should be distributed through the various committees, that we may facilitate the business of the Senate.

Mr. President, I do not care how long the discussion may be protracted, in my judgment it will not change men's opinions upon the merits of the question. There is only one side to it.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think it is proper that I should say one word upon the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator from Florida upon the point of order.

Mr. CALL. It is not a question in regard to the merits of the pending resolution. It is not a question in regard to substantial notice given. It is not a question in regard to the power of the Senate. We all know that it is in the power of the majority of the Senate to do anything. But the rule under consideration has been construed. In the case of the force bill precisely this question was raised, whether it be a resolution in writing or a motion. On the question of a change of the rules without a literal, strict, technical compliance with the requirement it was unanimously decided by this side of the Chamber, and I think by some votes on the other side, to be necessary.

Now, that had this effect: It postponed the consideration of what was regarded by a very large part of this body as a very important act of legislation. It gave time for reflection. And the object in view was never carried out because the majority of this body, composed of members of both parties, held that not a substantial, but a literal, strict, technical compliance with the rules was required. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] advocated that interpretation and he was sustained. That is precisely this case.

Mr. FRYE. Now, let us have the decision.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has no difficulty in determining this question. The Senate, by a yea-and-nay vote, has determined to proceed to the consideration of the pending resolution. No point of order was made prior to that determination upon the part of the Senate. The Chair can not sustain the point of order made after the Senate has taken this deliberate action.

That is one phase of the case. As to the other, the object of Rule XL is to prevent the Senate from being taken by surprise in an attempt to change the rules of this body. For that reason it is provided that—

> No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof.

On the 5th day of December the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] submitted a proposed amendment to the rules of the Senate. It was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed. From the 5th day of December until the present time that resolution has been before the Senate. It seems to the Chair that that is a compliance with the rules of the Senate. For that reason the Chair is constrained to overrule the point of order made by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HILL. Now I ask that the question on the adoption of the resolution be submitted to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is upon the adoption of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this is a subject that has excited my attention for several years. I have formed some very definite opinions upon it, but I do not intend to delay the Senate by expressing them at length. I think the work thrown upon the Committee on Appropriations at the closing period of a session is far beyond the possibility of its correct performance by the ablest committee that can be found among the membership of the body. The appropriation bills come to us generally at a late period in the session. I believe they are coming here at this session earlier than usual, but in the short session they are all lumped together during the last month, the month of February, the shortest month of the year, and the Committee on Appropriations is expected to go through all the items of appropriation that are made for the support of the National Government, amounting in the aggregate to $400,000,000.

When I first entered the House of Representatives nearly all the powers of appropriation, together with the power of framing tariff laws and all laws relating to money, was devolved upon one committee, the Committee of Ways and Means. Shortly afterwards, and during my term of service, that committee was deprived of several of its important functions, and new committees were created. From that time until the present the process has gone on in the House of Representatives to divide the labor of the appropriation of money and the various subjects connected with the appropriation of money among several different committees of the House. That I think we ought to have done.

It was in 1867 or 1868, I think, that the first division was made in the Senate. Up to that time the Committee on Finance had practical control of all financial legislation. It had control of the national banks. It had control of all funding laws. It had control of all the appropriation bills. In that small committee, composed I think then of seven members, all the vast work was done in respect to appropriations during the civil war. It was found probably that the work was hastily done. Mr. Fessenden, who was chairman of the committee for the greater portion of the period, himself complained of the labor imposed upon him as chairman of that committee, that it would break down his health, and I have no doubt it did largely contribute to the indisposition which followed his severe labors and which soon led to his, I think, premature death. Then the Senate began to divide up this work among other committees, and there were several committees that performed the duties of the Committee on Finance. Then the Committee on Appropriations was created, and other committees were from time to time added.

Now, it seems to me that in the proposition now made to us we have gone too far in that direction. In my judgment the Committee on Appropriations ought to be confined to the appropriation of moneys provided for by existing law. It ought not to deal as a rule with the new subjects of appropriations that are brought up from time to time. It seems to me that if the Committee on Appropriations were confined to departmental expenditures, as they are properly called, they would have enough, and more than enough, to do, probably more than any other committee of this body would have to do. As the committees are classified here in the resolution they are given the bills for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, for sundry civil expenses, and for all deficiencies. To that ought to be added the various departmental expenditures. For instance, the bill for the Agricultural Department it is here proposed to transfer to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

In my judgment that would not be a wise disposition. The Department of Agriculture, like any other Department of the Government, makes its annual estimates. They are submitted to the Treasury Department and they are there reexamined and finally sent here and placed before the proper committees of the Senate and the House. I think that the departmental appropriations ought to be provided for and passed upon by the Committee on Appropriations. I think that ought to be continued, because those expenditures, with some rare exceptions, are fixed by definite laws, and it is not very difficult to make up the appropriations.

So with the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I have now the honor to be chairman. I think it would be better that the Committee on Appropriations should prepare the appropriations for expenses in our foreign relations, because those expenditures, the salaries of our ministers and consuls and consular agents, are fixed by law. Indeed, all the expenses of our foreign service consist in the payment of salaries, and those salaries are fixed by law. I see no reason whatever why the Committee on Appropriations ought not to continue to make up the estimates for that Department.

There has been no difficulty at all between the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Appropriations about these matters. When we have recommended an increase of a consul or other officer in that service or have endeavored to raise the pay in various contingencies we have never had any difficulty in dealing with the Committee on Appropriations; they have generally conformed to our wishes in that particular. If these matters were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations probably the work would not be better performed than it is now, simply because all the expenditures, I may say with scarcely an exception, are provided for by existing law and the amount is fixed, so that there is very rarely any controversy in regard to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

In regard to military affairs the appropriation for the expenses of our Army is purely a matter of computation. The pay of our soldiers is fixed, the pay of every officer is fixed. There are but few if any contingent expenditures; they are mainly fixed by existing law; and all the Committee on Appropriations have to do is to see that the appropriations conform to the existing law. If any new items of appropriations are proposed for the Army they would naturally come from the Committee on Military Affairs, and upon being reported from that committee be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and I have no doubt readily acquiesced in by that committee when they are so reported. The same might be said in regard to naval affairs. As to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, there is nothing in the expenditures of the Government for post-offices and post-roads except what is fixed by existing law. All the contracts are made by advertisement upon bids rendered and competition had. The pay of the postmasters is fixed according to the amount of their receipts; and as the duty of the committee is only to see that the appropriations conform to existing laws, I do not see any reason why they may not discharge those duties.

There is another class of duties that I think the Committee on Appropriations ought to be relieved from. Wherever the great body, or a considerable part, of the appropriations to be made are to be made by Congress from time to time, then I can see no reason why in such cases the appropriations for moneys so proposed to be expended and authorized by law should not be provided for under the charge of the different committees. For instance, take the pension appropriation bill. That bill provides for the appropriation of a gross sum. We can not tell how much it may be. The Commissioner of Pensions can generally tell about what amount will be required, and if the law is changed by the Committee on Pensions, that committee can better tell than any other what appropriations should be made. I can see no reason whatever why the Committee on Pensions should not have charge of the pension appropriation bill, because they are better informed, more familiar with the new laws, and have better opportunities for wise and proper action.

So with the other bureau expenditures. I can see no reason in the world why the Committee on Indian Affairs should not deal with the bill making appropriations for that Bureau, for it is a Bureau and not a Department of the Government, and the expenditures are uncertain. No doubt most of the expenditures are fixed by treaty, but there are constant disturbances in Indian affairs, and sometimes large sums of money have to be appropriated that can not in all cases be foreseen. The Committee on Indian Affairs, therefore, ought to be charged with the duty of taking care of that bill.

So with the Committee on Commerce. It would be perfect folly to send to the Committee on Appropriations the immense bills that are passed upon by the Committee on Commerce for internal improvements. The Committee on Appropriations would not have time to ascertain how much should be expended on the Ohio River, how much on the Great Lakes, and in different parts of the country. To properly act upon that bill requires a character of information which the Committee on Appropriations does not possess. Therefore righteously and properly that appropriation bill heretofore has been withdrawn from the Committee on Appropriations and referred to the Committee on Commerce, where it properly belongs. I see no reason whatever why all the appropriations made for commerce, which must vary from year to year, and which must depend upon the existing state of the Treasury Department and the amount of surplus revenue, as well as upon the various places where the money is to be expended, and which require yearly a new estimate of the amount needed for each particular place, should not be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

So I should favor that all appropriations hereafter to be made for coast defenses should be referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses, for the same reason that I gave in regard to referring the river and harbor bill to the Committee on Commerce. The amount needed for coast defenses would naturally be estimated by the committee having charge of that subject, and it seems to me that such a bill ought to go to the Committee on Coast Defenses. What is the use of having a Committee on Coast Defenses unless you refer to that committee the expenditures which are necessary to fortify and protect our coasts?

I have no doubt the experienced Senators who are now members of the Committee on Appropriations will admit that they have not the local information that is necessary to pass upon the bill providing for the expenditures of the District of Columbia. My honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], who is a member of the District Committee, knows more already in his short term of service in the Senate as to the conditions in the city of Washington, and the necessity for expenditures, and where the money should be expended than the members of the Committee on Appropriations. I myself know more, perhaps, than most of the members of the Committee on Appropriations on that subject, because I have been here longer and have seen the city rise into its present condition.

It seems to me that the Committee on the District of Columbia ought to pass upon all the questions that affect the expenditures in the District. The people of the District pay one-half of all that is expended. Many, many persons, leading citizens of the District, have called upon me to right wrongs, injustices, or inequalities they suffer, and I have said to them to "go at once to the Committee on Appropriations." But they do not know anything about the Committee on Appropriations. The members of that committee have no special intercourse with them, while the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia are constantly brought into knowledge of the condition of affairs prevailing here, and therefore, as a matter of course, the bills providing for the expenditures of this District, one-half of which, as I have said, are to be paid by the Government and the other half by the citizens of the District, ought to be prepared by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

I do not think there ought to be any feeling about this subject. No one underrates the high character and standing of the gentlemen who compose the Committee on Appropriations, and no one would desire to wound their feelings. We know they are able men; but in devising and dividing the various duties that are put upon our different committees, it is but just and fair that we should regard the public interests and the interests of the people who are especially affected by these appropriations. While the departmental expenditures might be left to the charge and care of the Committee on Appropriations, these other matters, which depend upon annual appropriations, ought to be distributed among the various committees which have charge of that character of business.

If the opportunity shall offer, I shall vote for the last five clauses of the resolution, and against the clauses preceding them. That is my view of what is best to be done. If, however, the Senate should take away from the Committee on Appropriations all the departmental expenditures of the Government, they might as well dismantle and discharge that committee, for all that would be left to them under the resolution would be:

All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations—except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and inserting the following:

That is pretty sweeping—

"The general appropriation bills shall be referred to committees as follows:

"To the Committee on Appropriations: The bills for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, for sundry civil expenses, and for all deficiencies."

The legislative, executive, and judicial expenses are the very expenses that are provided for and referred to other committees. The resolution says:

The bills for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses.

That would include the salary of the President and a few other officers of the Executive Departments, the salaries of the judges, and the judges are very few in number, and bills for the pay of the Senate and House of Representatives, and then "for sundry civil expenses," which are not named, but, as a matter of course, as bills for civil expenses are referred to other committees, they would not be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and then "for all deficiencies."

This would leave to the Committee on Appropriations less important duties than are conferred upon the Committee on Military Affairs, or the Committee on Naval Affairs, or the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and the amounts that the Committee on Appropriations would deal with would not compare with the amounts which are provided for these great Departments of the Government. I think, therefore, my friend from Idaho, in endeavoring to bring about a very sensible reform and a very proper distribution of labor here, has gone a little too far, and I hope that he, or the Senate for him, will correct these errors if possible, and will leave to the Committee on Appropriations the charge of all the departmental expenses of the Government, including the legislative, executive, and judicial.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the first inclination of my mind was in favor of the general scheme of the project of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], but consideration of the measure which has been proposed and the remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] convince me that it goes too far, and that it will not do, in the interest of the Government, to scatter the appropriation bills among so many committees.

There is one reason that I have not yet heard advanced against the proposition to divide these appropriation bills among a number of committees, and to my mind, the more I think of it, the more potent and real that objection seems. It is this: If these appropriations were divided under the scheme proposed by this resolution, each of these committees would have one subject committed to its charge. The Committee on Naval Affairs would have the one subject, a large one of course, of the expenses for the naval establishment; the Military Committee would have that for the military establishment; the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads the post-office establishment, and the Committee on Foreign Relations the foreign service; and so on.

We know that each committee would have its attention concentrated upon its own particular jurisdiction, and would necessarily, in confining its attention to the items of appropriation which belonged to its department, so called, lose sight of all other departments, and therefore we should lose the benefit, which I am convinced must be a very great one, and one which we have enjoyed in the past, in committing to one committee the large amount of these departmental appropriations; and that is, that they shall keep in view the state of the Federal Treasury and the aggregate of all appropriations. The danger would be that the Military Committee or the Coast Defense Committee would, in considering their jurisdiction and the object for which they were constituted, necessarily come to consider that they have the whole Treasury of the United States at their service, and they would minimize the importance of all other appropriations in comparison with those which they had in charge. Therefore this distribution, as proposed in the resolution, would be, it seems to me, to promote extravagance, and not be in the interests of that economy which is so important in spending the money which we take from the pockets of the people.

I therefore think that a scheme much less comprehensive than the one proposed by the Senator from Idaho ought to be substituted for it, certainly before I vote for it, and that we ought not to lose sight of the advantage that we have had all along from this concentration of the minds of a large committee upon the aggregate of appropriations and upon the whole field of governmental expenditure.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I was simply going to suggest that if the same argument were carried to its legitimate conclusion, would it not compel the Senate to prohibit the Commerce Committee from taking charge of the river and harbor bill?

Mr. GRAY. I think not. Perhaps that is one exception to the rule. It has peculiar considerations belonging to it, and it is a very long and intricate bill. It is an intermittent appropriation. There are certain years in which no appropriation at all is made, and the amount of the appropriation varies from year to year very extensively. Of course, I admit the principle would apply, but one exception is not so bad as a great many.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware has just been predicting what the result of this would be. My service in the House of Representatives has been comparatively very recent, and I can speak of what is likely to be and what is under the system there employed. The same predictions were made there as to the great increase of appropriations. I took some pains in the other House, when it was proposed to take two other appropriation bills from the Committee on Appropriations, to look into that matter a little, and I could not find that there had been any sudden increase of appropriations owing to the distribution of the bills. I know from service on one committee—I was on the Naval Committee which prepared the naval appropriation bill—how it worked in practice.

In the first place, a committee having only one appropriation bill gives great attention to it, and I think it prepares a better bill than can be prepared by a committee which has fourteen bills. When an appropriation bill comes into the House from the Naval Committee, or any other committee which has a single appropriation bill to consider, it is subjected to the watchful and very jealous scrutiny of the Committee on Appropriations, who follow everything the other committee undertakes to do. That is one reason, I think, for this arrangement having worked so well in the House of Representatives.

Further, those bills were distributed in the House of Representatives, and there is not a suggestion or a thought in that House of going back to the old system. It is universally conceded that the new system has worked well. I think it is a much better system than the old. I think it is fairer to the committees. I think we get more intelligent bills, from the simple fact that no committee can give to the fourteen appropriation bills the consideration which they deserve.

We could not have an abler or more efficient Committee on Appropriations than we now have, but it is a physical impossibility, in my judgment, for that committee to perform the work, and I think the experience of the House of Representatives has demonstrated it.

I observed the Senator from Ohio, when he was speaking, advised the withdrawal from the Committee on Appropriations of two appropriation bills which the House of Representatives have left with its Committee on Appropriations, the pension and the District of Columbia appropriation bills. I always thought when in the other House that those bills also should be taken away from the Committee on Appropriations, and I think it was illogical to stop where the House did. I never could see any good reason for it, particularly in the case of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, where I think the argument is exceptionally strong against it remaining with the Committee on Appropriations. As for this proposed distribution, the Committee on Appropriations will have the two great appropriation bills, the ones in which the new appropriations are made, the largest and the most important of all the bills. They have, through those and the deficiency bill, a survey of every appropriation for the Government. I think this change would probably increase their power in the long run over the general course of appropriations, and, far from leading to extravagance, I think, if anything, it would tend to better bills, and that the money appropriated would be expended to greater advantage.

There is another point, Mr. President. Our Committee on Appropriations, as the Senator from Ohio has said, has a tremendous burden to carry at the end of every session. It is more, I think, than almost any men can sustain. At the close of a short session they are obliged to be in conference on half a dozen bills, and they have to supply all their conferees from one committee. The House of Representatives sends three fresh men to every conference on an appropriation bill, with nothing but that one bill to attend to, which gives the House, in my judgment, a very great advantage in conference, merely a physical advantage, but I think it is one to be considered.

Mr. President, these are the reasons—and they are drawn from experience—which lead me to favor this change. So far as the actual condition here goes, it seems to me that it would be better for the Senate to give to some of the large committees which now exist, and have little to do, duties which are important to be performed. I do not believe this proposed change is going to do any harm; on the contrary, I believe it is going to be a very beneficial measure.

It is hardly necessary for me to disclaim any personal feeling in the matter toward the members of the Committee on Appropriations. So far as I am concerned, I have never received anything but the most generous and considerate treatment at their hands, as I presume all Senators have. I do not think that it is quite fair to put it on personal grounds. It gives it a disagreeable aspect, which none of us like to feel. I think this is a necessary change in the rules, and I hope, now the Senate has taken it up, now that it has manifested by a large majority its desire to make this change, we shall continue until we vote upon the resolution and decide definitely upon this change.

Mr. MILLS. May I interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to appeal to the memory of both the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], who, like myself, have recently come from the House of Representatives. It has been charged that the distribution of these bills among the different committees will lead to more extravagant appropriations. I wish to ask the two Senators—because they are familiar with the matter, having served on committees which have had charge of appropriation bills in the other House—if it has not been a uniform fact that the bills have come back to the House of Representatives increased by the Senate? Was not that their experience in the other House?

Mr. LODGE. They uniformly came back to the House largely increased.

Mr. MILLS. In the Senate there is but one committee having charge of appropriation bills, while in the House there are twelve or fourteen.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senate will bear me out in what I have said, that the effect of a distribution of the bills in the House of Representatives was that we thereby got not only the supervision of the committee to which they were immediately taken, but a very close and jealous scrutiny of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is it not notorious and well known that the House Committee on Appropriations places appropriations at the very lowest estimate, far below anything that they know will do, and compels the Senate to increase the appropriations or cripple the public service?

Mr. LODGE. I think that may be true.

Mr. COCKRELL. And is it not true that very frequently they only appropriate for three-fourths of the year and inquire of the heads of Departments how much it will take to run the Departments up to a certain time—nine months of the year?

Mr. LODGE. I think that may all be true, but I do not think it touches the question of increasing appropriations by the proposed distribution.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, it is sought by this resolution to change the distribution of power in the Senate, to emancipate the Senate from the monopolistic dominance of about 20 men here who compose the two leading committees, those of Appropriations and Finance. It is the same struggle that was had in the House of Representatives in 1885. Prior to that time in the House all the appropriation bills intended to provide funds for the support of the Government originated in the Committee on Appropriations. It was an undue deposit of power in one committee, of authority in the hands of a few gentlemen who composed the committee. The same is true of the Senate of the United States to-day. There is too much power lodged in one committee, when to that committee all the appropriation bills designed to support the Government are referred after reaching this body from the House. The object of the pending measure is to change that, and to bring about a more equitable distribution of the power of the Senate among its committees.

The same objections which are now urged to this resolution here were urged at great length in the debate which ensued in the House. After an elaborate discussion, every reason that was possible being urged by its opponents against the proposed change, the matter came to a test vote in the House of Representatives on the 18th of December, 1885. It came on an amendment offered by Mr. Hammond of Georgia to the pending proposition, the effect of which was, if adopted, to leave all the appropriation bills in the hands of the Appropriations Committee, as theretofore. The vote stood in favor of the Hammond amendment, to retain the old order of things, 70, and against it, 227. By a great majority the House of Representatives determined upon a change similar to the one which the Senator from Idaho proposes to make in the Senate now.

In the House of Representatives at that time there were seven gentlemen who now occupy seats upon this floor. Six of the seven voted for the change alluded to, and the seventh, now the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], is recorded as absent, but he informs me had he been present he would have supported the proposition then as he is supporting it now. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] who is before me was one of the gentlemen in the House of Representatives who supported the proposition. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was another, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] was another, the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] was another, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] was another, and I was the sixth.

We all voted then for a change which we believed was in the right direction, and I submit that time has justified the action then taken. More than ten years have elapsed since the change was effected, and, as was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], there is no suggestion from any quarter that it was one not to the advantage of the Government, or to the proper conduct of legislation. If the proposition were presented now in the other House to overturn the present condition of affairs, as respects the distribution of powers among the committees, and to go back to the old order of things, by which one committee was the depositary of nearly all the authority of the House of Representatives, it would not command a corporal's guard of votes there in its favor.

It is nowhere alleged, or, if it be, it is not susceptible of proof, that the appropriations designed to meet the expenses of the Government are any more extravagant now than they were prior to the time of the change. What increase there has been in aggregate appropriations is only such as was required by the growth of the country. The principal argument made by Mr. Randall, of Pennsylvania, and by other leading members of the House of Representatives against the charge, was that once divide the appropriation bills among several committees and it would tend to extravagance in the appropriations. Sir, it was tried, and the prediction has not been fulfilled. It did result, however, in a better consideration of the ten or twelve appropriation bills of Congress than was possible at the hands of one committee.

The Appropriations Committee of the Senate is composed of a set of gentlemen industrious as well as able, but when you send to them a dozen appropriation bills, carrying in the aggregate appropriations of from three hundred and fifty to four hundred million dollars per annum, it is impossible for the committee to give full and complete consideration to such bills and then find time for other work. But if they are divided up, if, for instance, to the Committee on Naval Affairs there be sent the appropriation bill for the naval establishment, with only the one bill of the kind before it, that committee can give fuller and more enlarged consideration to the measure than it is possible for the Committee on Appropriations to do with all the other appropriation bills likewise to handle.

Mr. President, I look upon the pending measure as one of reform. Every year the expenditures of the Government are increasing, and in proportion as they increase additional labor is imposed upon the Appropriations Committee under the present system. If it was a good change to make in the House of Representatives ten years ago, I submit it is a good change to make now in the Senate of the United States.

I do not doubt that such a change would find welcome in the country. There is no sentiment anywhere of which I am aware, unless it be among the older members of this body, opposing this reform and objecting to this change.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Louisiana let me ask him a question before he sits down?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator was for a long time a member of the House of Representatives, and was there when this radical change was adopted by the House. If the Senator has not already told the Senate—having invoked the example of the other House—will he tell the Senate now what appropriation bills in that movement in the other House were left to the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. BLANCHARD. As I recollect, there were left to the Committee on Appropriations the sundry civil appropriation bill, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, all the deficiency appropriation bills, and one or two others I do not now recall.

Mr. HALE. I am sorry the Senator, so lately from the other House, has forgotten that in that measure, adopted after great discussion and objection, the House did not pretend to go to anything like the extent that the pending resolution does, but left to the Appropriations Committee, no question being made, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, the sundry civil bill, the deficiency bill, the great pension bill, which is the largest of all in the Government, the fortifications bill, the District of Columbia bill—half of the bills, and no further than that did any member of the House ask to go.

But this resolution drives ruthlessly way beyond, double what the House of Representatives determined upon, and leaves to the Committee on Appropriations only the appropriations for the running of the Departments, deficiencies made by other committees, and the sundry civil bill. I thought that the Senator, who was invoking the example of the other House, would have a clear recollection of what was done there and, after producing his arguments in favor of the salutary nature of the House proposition, would tell us how far the House of Representatives went. Senators do not realize that this proposition goes a great way beyond what the House of Representatives then attempted or has since attempted to do. It is a fact that in the other House out of the twelve or thirteen bills, six of them were left to the Committee on Appropriations without objection, including the largest bill of the entire number, the great pension bill with $140,000,000 on it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The reform which was instituted in the House of Representatives ten years ago was a movement in the right direction. Perhaps it did not go so far as the pending resolution designs to go. Perhaps it did leave (and about that I did not recollect) in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations the pension appropriation bill. But why should that bill be left in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations? Why is not the Committee on Pensions of this body as competent to handle it as is the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. HALE. Why is not the Committee on Pensions of the other House as competent as the Committee on Appropriations of this body?

Mr. BLANCHARD. There are two pension committees in the House—one known as the Committee on Pensions, the other as the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I said the action of the House of Representatives was a reform going in the right direction. Perhaps it did not go far enough, and now after an experience of ten years of what the other House did, as far as it went, the Senate takes up the proposition, and proposes to go even further on this line of reform. What objection can the Senator from Maine find to the Committee on Pensions of the Senate having charge of the pension appropriation bill?

Mr. HALE. Now, will the Senator answer me, taking that argument, why, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] said, he should be left out? If the pension appropriation bill goes to the Committee on Pensions, why should not the patent appropriation go the Patent Committee? And the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says, then, why should not the appropriations for the courts and the judicial department of the Government go to the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. PLATT. And the public-lands appropriation go to the Public Lands Committee.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Louisiana say why, in his reform march of destruction, the Senator from Idaho, as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, has failed to follow the argument of the Senator from Louisiana and has neglected to send the public lands appropriation to the Committee on Public Lands? I do not know why the light-house appropriation should not go to the Committee on Commerce.

The truth is, the movement is revolutionary, and when you begin you may as well deprive the Committee on Appropriations of its entire jurisdiction. There is not an argument which the Senator has given about the Committee on Pensions that does not apply to the Committee on Patents, to the Committee on the Judiciary, to the Committee on Public Lands, and to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The Committee on Pensions ought to have charge of the pension appropriation bill, because for a long time past it has been made a separate bill in itself, and, as the Senator from Maine says, the largest of all the appropriation bills, involving from one hundred and forty to one hundred and fifty million dollars annually. Now, when the Senator speaks of the appropriations for the courts, they are a part of the judicial expenditures of the Government. When he speaks of the appropriations for patents, the Patent Office is one of the bureaus in the Interior Department. It is true that so is the Pension Office a bureau in the Interior Department; but we can properly segregate the appropriation for it from that of the other bureaus because of its magnitude.

The appropriation bill known as the legislative, executive, and judicial bill carries appropriations for the support of the courts, the Patent Office, the Land Office, the light-houses, mentioned by the Senators, and for the other bureaus of the Government, and the necessity does not now exist to multiply the number of appropriation bills. When the other House came to distribute the appropriation bills it did see proper, as I am reminded by the Senator from Maine, to leave the pension appropriation bill in the hands of the regular Appropriations Committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me?

Mr. BLANCHARD. In one moment. But that is no argument against the reform which was carried out at least in part at that time by the other House, and it is no argument against the reform which is now sought to be carried out in the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I desire to ask the Senator from Louisiana whether the advent of the billion-dollar Congress, of which we have heard a great deal in various ways for a number of years, was after this magnificent reform of which the Senator is speaking took place in the House of Representatives?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The change took place in the House of Representatives in 1885; and the Senator from Rhode Island knows that the "billion-dollar Congress" held forth in 1890. I now recall that some very eminent gentleman in the Republican party, in which organization the Senator from Rhode Island is a shining light, speaking of the billion-dollar Congress said, "Begad, this is a billion-dollar country"; and I presume to that observation the Senator from Rhode Island will subscribe.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, my apology for saying a word on this occasion is that I have experienced the beneficence of the new system inaugurated in the other House. It is unparliamentary, of course, to refer to the proceedings of the present House of Representatives, but not to what has transpired in the past. I went into the other House in 1883. At that time all the appropriation bills with but one or possibly two exceptions were dumped into the hands of the Appropriations Committee. The question came up for consideration, and the result was as the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] has stated. Our experience after that change was made, so far as I know, and I was on one of the committees that was affected by the change, the Committee on Indian Affairs, was considered by everybody beneficent and good.

I know that our Indian appropriation bills after that time were repeatedly and in many particulars increased in the Senate. I know of my own knowledge that claims which I regarded as having no place on the Indian appropriation bill were put on in the Senate, and were on the bill when it came back to the House.

But, Mr. President, there is one point that lies at the root of the whole matter which has not been mentioned, and to it I wish to call the attention of Senators. We are here as States on a parity with each other. Nevada and Delaware stand here on an equal parity with New York; and Senators are here on a parity with each other. The most important legislation before the Senate are the appropriation bills. There is no set of bills and legislation so important as those bills. To segregate all that class of legislation and put it into the hands of one committee and exclude all the others is not putting Senators or committees on a parity. It is assuming that a select body of 13 men are the only ones competent to deal with the subject and that the other Senators and the other committees are incompetent.

What I have said here I have said in the utmost of Christian spirit. I have the highest regard for the members of the Appropriations Committee as Senators and as individuals. If the practice of dumping all the appropriation bills into one committee is to prevail, I do not know that if I had the selection I could pick a better or more worthy set than the gentlemen now on the committee; but I suggest to them that in fairness to other Senators and in fairness to other States they ought to be willing to consent to a measure for the distribution of this important legislation among the different committees of the Senate.

Mr. SEWELL obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARRIS. I did not know that the Senator from New Jersey had taken the floor.

Mr. SEWELL. I have the highest regard for the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. HARRIS. I believe I will ask the Senator from New Jersey, if it is agreeable to him, to yield to a motion to adjourn at this time.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator from Tennessee will allow me to submit an amendment to the resolution, I will accede to his suggestion.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly, and if we adjourn at this time the Senator will be upon the floor when we meet again.

Mr. SEWELL. So I understand. For fear that a point of order might be made against it, I have reduced to writing the amendment which I propose.

Mr. GORMAN and Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Amendment intended to be proposed to Senate resolution No. 6: Insert in line 17, after "Military Academy," the words "and the National and State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and Sailors."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. CALL. I submit an amendment to the pending resolution, which I ask may lie upon the table and be printed.

Mr. GORMAN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the resolution the following:

After the appropriation bills shall be reported to the Senate by the several committees, they shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations for consideration and report to the Senate the total amount of the appropriation and such recommendation in relation to the total amount of such appropriations and necessary changes in such bills as may be necessary to keep them within the revenues of the Government and adequate for its requirements.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to submit an amendment at this time, which may be printed. After the word "following," at the end of the sixth line, I propose to insert the words "after the close of the present session of Congress."

Mr. BATE. I had intended, and so stated, to move an executive session this afternoon, but it is now so late that I shall not do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 1691) to authorize the St. Louis and Oklahoma City Railroad Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian and Oklahoma Territories, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 2917) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to pay from their own funds for certain legal services rendered the "Old Settlers" or Western Cherokee Indians.

The bill (H. R. 3812) to authorize the Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Choctaw Nation, in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill may lie on the table. It is a bill similar to one already reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will lie on the table.

AMERICAN REGISTERS FOR BARKS MINDE AND JOHAN LUDWIG.

The bill (H. R. 173) to provide American registers for the barks Minde and Johan Ludwig was read twice by its title.

Mr. PASCO. That bill is identical with one which has been recommended by the Committee on Commerce, and is now on the Calendar. I ask that the House bill may be taken up by unanimous consent and put upon its passage. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be read, so that we may know what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to have the Senator from Florida inform the Senate as to the reason why these vessels are to be admitted, upon what expenditures made, and their value.

Mr. PASCO. I will state that the case comes within the general law except in a single particular.

Mr. SEWELL. Is there a report in the case?

Mr. PASCO. There is a written report in the case, and the bill comes——

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to have the report read, or let the bill lie over.

Mr. PASCO. A bill identical with this has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that one of these vessels was built originally in an American shipyard. It is a small vessel. On the other one there was expended considerably more than the amount required by the existing law; but they were not wrecked within 3 miles of the shore.

Mr. SEWELL. That is a sufficient explanation.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PASCO. I move that the bill (S. 677) to provide American registers for the barks Minde and Johan Ludwig be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. VILAS. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will give way for a motion that we may have a brief executive session for the consideration of business not contested, but which ought to be disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. If it is the wish of the Senate to consider non-contested cases, I shall not interpose. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. VILAS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 5, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

TUESDAY, February 4, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COIN REDEMPTION FUND.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue, with an amendment of the Senate in the nature of a substitute, with the recommendation that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment and insist upon the bill as it originally passed the House.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to state that that report is not unanimous. The minority report will recommend concurrence.

The SPEAKER. The report will be placed on the Union Calendar.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to give notice that I will call up the bill which has been reported, with the Senate substitute, for consideration immediately after the District of Columbia appropriation bill shall have been disposed of.

INDIAN HUNTING GROUNDS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 4444) providing for commissioners to treat with certain Indians for the surrender or modification of any rights claimed by them to hunt on the unoccupied domain of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint commissioners to treat with the Shoshone and Arapahoe Indians now located on the Shoshone Reservation in Fremont County, Wyo., and with the Shoshone and Bannock Indians, located on the Fort Hall Reservation in Idaho, for the surrender or modification of any rights which they may claim under the treaty signed July 3, 1868, to hunt on the unoccupied public domain of the United States. The commissioners so appointed may treat with the said Indians, either for the complete surrender of all rights claimed by them to hunt on the unoccupied lands of the United States off of their respective reservations or for the modification of the rights claimed by them to such an extent that they shall be amenable to State game laws end regulations.

SEC. 2. That to carry out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The Committee on Indian Affairs recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

Strike out the word "treat" where it occurs in the bill and insert the word "negotiate" instead.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, the amendments recommended by the committee agreed to, and, as amended, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. The title of the bill was amended to read:

A bill providing for commissioners to negotiate with certain Indians for the surrender or modification of any rights claimed by them to hunt on the unoccupied public domain of the United States.

FOUNDRY BUILDING, WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate joint resolution No. 23, which is on the Union Calendar, a joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to use a portion of the appropriation for a new iron roof for foundry at navy-yard, Washington, D. C., in the act entitled an "Act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," for repairs to the walls of said foundry.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to use such part of the $33,000 appropriated for new iron roof for foundry in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," under the caption "Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks, navy-yards and stations, Naval Academy, and New Naval Observatory," and under the subhead "Navy-yard, Washington, D. C.," as may be necessary for repairs to the walls of said foundry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CRISP. I would like to ask the gentleman if this has been reported by a House committee?

Mr. HILBORN. Yes, sir; and carries no appropriation.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman please explain it?

Mr. CANNON. What is this matter?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is trying to get order on the floor so the gentleman may find out.

Mr. HILBORN. What is the inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CRISP. I understand from a gentleman sitting near me that he has examined the matter and it is satisfactory, and being satisfactory to the committee, I have no further inquiry to make.

Mr. HILBORN. I ask the reading of the letter from the Navy Department attached to the report, which fully explains it.

The letter was read, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 11, 1895.

SIR: In the naval estimates for the year ending June 30, 1896, under the heading "Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks, navy-yards and stations," etc., and subhead "Navy-yard, Washington, D. C.," one item was, "For new iron roof and repairs to walls of foundry (submitted), $33,000."

When the appropriation bill passed it read, "For new roof for foundry, $33,000"; as the repairs to the wall were not mentioned, we have been unable to use any of the money appropriated, as the walls must be repaired before the new iron roof can be put on.

It is respectfully requested that the accompanying joint resolution may be passed at once, in order that the necessary steps may be taken toward putting on the new roof appropriated for.

Respectfully,

H. A. HERBERT,
Secretary of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

Mr. CANNON. Who reports this resolution?

Mr. HILBORN. The House Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CANNON. Then the House Committee on Naval Affairs wrongfully got jurisdiction of it. It is a mere deficiency.

Mr. HILBORN. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it is to make a deficiency appropriation available.

Mr. HILBORN. As I understand it, in the last estimate for naval repairs there was an estimate of $33,000 for two purposes, one to strengthen the wall of the new foundry——

Mr. CANNON. I understand.

Mr. HILBORN. And the other for the roof of the building—an iron roof—both appropriations being contained in one bill. When the bill came to be prepared, all allusion to the walls was left out, and $33,000 was left for the roof, which is more than is necessary. You have, therefore, an appropriation to build a roof and nothing to suport it. The appropriation, as I have said, was made for both purposes, both for the walls and roof. Now the Department wants permission from the House to use a portion of the $33,000 to carry out the intention of Congress.

Mr. CANNON. The Senate passed this bill?

Mr. HILBORN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And it also received the indorsement of the Naval Committee of the House?

Mr. HILBORN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And you report from that committee favorably?

Mr. HILBORN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Well, in my judgment, the committee has no jurisdiction, but I do not care about splitting hairs in regard to the matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASE OF RAILROAD LANDS, ETC.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 708) to amend section 4 of an act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes, which is on the Union Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following proviso: "Provided further, That where such purchasers, their heirs or assigns, have paid only a portion of the purchase price to the company, which is less than the Government price of similar lands, they shall be required, before the delivery of patent for their lands, to pay to the Government a sum equal to the difference between the portion of the purchase price so paid and the Government price, and in such case the amount demanded from the company shall be the amount paid to it by such purchaser."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ELLIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FRANCES R. JACK AND OTHERS.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 573) for the relief of Frances R. Jack, Elizabeth J. Jack, and Matilda W. Jack.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, to Frances R. Jack, Elizabeth J. Jack, and Matilda W. Jack the sum of $298.10, on account of rent of building in the city of Roanoke, Va., for use as post-office.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask for an explanation.

The SPEAKER. Subject to the right of objection, the gentleman will be allowed to explain.

Mr. OTEY. I ask that the report may be read.

The report (by Mr. HUTCHESON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 573) entitled "A bill for the relief of Francis R. Jack, Elizabeth J. Jack, and Matilda W. Jack," respectfully report the same as amended and recommend that it do pass.

The amendment is as follows:

After the words "sum of," in the sixth line, strike out "ninety-eight dollars and ten," and insert in lieu thereof "fifty-nine dollars and twenty-two," thus eliminating the interest charged from July 1, 1893, amounting to $38.88.

The facts are these, as gathered from the First Assistant Postmaster-General, as well as the applicant:

On March 5, 1893, the premises occupied by the post-office in the city of Roanoke, Va., were destroyed by fire, and the post-office was removed across the street to the building owned by the Misses Jack. A lease was entered into with the Misses Jack for a term of years from July 1, 1893. The appropriation was exhausted, so that the rental could not be paid except from the 1st of July, 1893, and the Misses Jack agreed that they would accept payments from the 5th of March to the 1st of July, as far as the appropriation would permit, without prejudice to their claim for the regular rental. So the account, briefly stated and admitted as correct, the details of which, with the statements of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, are on file with the committee, is as follows:

From March 5 to July 1, 1893, rental due	$387.00
By amounts paid by the postmaster at Roanoke during the months of March, April, May, and June, 1893	127.78
Balance due	259.22

As stated, interest was added to this, which the committee eliminated.

The claim is a just one and should be paid, and your committee therefore recommend that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Claims, set forth in the report, was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO PATENT LAWS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to move the reference of the bill (H. R. 271) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States to the Committee on Patents.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection.

EFFICIENCY OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged resolution. I am directed by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service to call up for consideration the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolution (No. 148) in lieu of resolution No. 108.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Attorney-General, the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Public Printer, the Civil Service Commissioners, the Commissioner of Labor, and the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries be requested to furnish the House of Representatives with the following information, namely: The number of employees there are in their respective Departments, and the salaries of each, who are below a fair standard of efficiency, together with the cause of their inefficiency; and if inefficiency is caused by age, state the age at which they became inefficient.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BROSIUS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MICHAEL RYAN.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1816) for the relief of Michael Ryan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to revoke the order dishonorably discharging Private Michael Ryan, Company I, Fifth Regiment United States Infantry, on September 20, 1865, and to issue to him an honorable discharge from the military service of the United States as of that date.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Has this bill been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes, favorably.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. It has been reported by our committee.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report, if there be no objection.

The report (by Mr. GRIFFIN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1816) for the relief of Michael Ryan, have had the same under consideration, and find that the soldier enlisted in Company I, Fifth United States Infantry. At the end of his first term of service, September 20, 1862, he reenlisted for three years, and served faithfully and with credit through the entire war.

In the summer of 1865 his regiment was sent to New Mexico, and while at Fort Sumner, near the end of his second term of enlistment, he was one night detailed to guard artillery on the parade ground. Where the detail was formed some old arms were piled, among which he observed an old Colt's revolver, which he picked up and put in his blouse pocket. A noncommissioned officer saw the act and preferred a charge of theft of the property of the United States against Ryan, who was tried by court-martial, which convened August 17, 1865, and found him guilty, notwithstanding his statement that he took up the pistol with the intention of keeping it during that night on guard, and also the fact that his first lieutenant testified that he had known Ryan since July, 1862, and had always considered him a very good soldier; that he had never known him to be accused of theft until that occasion.

A bill identical with this (H. R. 8391) was introduced in the House of Representatives, third session Fifty-third Congress, and also during the same session a similar bill was introduced in the Senate, known as Senate bill 2510. The House Committee on Military Affairs of the Fifty-third Congress reported on H. R. bill 8391, in part, as follows:

"This soldier served the United States from 1857 to 1865. The facts in this case are fully set forth in a letter directed to Hon. LOREN FLETCHER, a member of this Congress, from Hon. William Lochren, Commissioner of Pensions, concerning Senate bill 2510, identical with the House bill, which letter is herewith appended and made a part of this report.

"The committee have examined the proceedings of the court-martial which tried Private Ryan, and to which reference is made in the aforesaid letter, and find that the facts, as proven at the trial, are correctly set forth by the Commissioner of Pensions."

The bill (H. R. 8391) passed both Houses of the Fifty-third Congress, but failed to reach the President in time to receive the Executive approval.

Your committee would therefore recommend that H. R. 1816 do pass.

The following is a copy of the letter from the Commissioner of Pensions above referred to:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, February 7, 1895.

MY DEAR SIR: I am quite desirous, as I have stated to you, for the passage of the bill (S. 2510) for the relief of Michael Ryan, late private Company I, Fifth Regiment United States Infantry. It will be an act of justice to a deserving soldier and good citizen of our State, and constituent of your own, with whom you have, as I believe, some personal acquaintance.

Michael Ryan, when a youth and before the late war, enlisted in that company and regiment. At the end of his first term of service, September 20, 1862, he at once reenlisted for another term of three years, and served faithfully and with credit through the entire war. In the summer of 1865 the regiment was sent to New Mexico, and while stationed at Fort Sumner, near the end of his second term of enlistment, he was one night included in a detail to guard artillery upon the parade ground. Where the detail was formed some old arms were piled, among which he observed an old Colt's revolver, which he picked up and put in his blouse pocket.

The act was noticed by a noncommissioned officer, who, finding that he had put the revolver in his pocket, arrested him and preferred a charge against him of theft of property of the United States. Upon this charge he was tried by court-martial, convened August 17, 1865, and found guilty, notwithstanding his statement that he took up the pistol with the intention of keeping it during that night on guard, and notwithstanding the fact that the first lieutenant of his company testified, "I have known Private Ryan since sometime in July, 1862, and have always considered him a very good soldier; never have known him to be accused of theft until the present occasion." He was sentenced to be kept at hard labor in charge of the guard for the remainder of his term of enlistment, and to be then dishonorably discharged, with forfeiture of all pay and allowances, except the just dues to the laundress and sutler. This sentence was approved September 2, 1865, eighteen days before the expiration of his second term of enlistment.

Mr. Ryan has related the matter to me several times, and I have examined the original record of the court-martial in the office of the Judge-Advocate-General, and have a copy of the same, kindly furnished me by that officer, which I will transmit, if desired. But there is no question as to the simple facts as I have briefly stated them. The only matter in doubt is the intent with which he picked up the old revolver and put it in his pocket, when going out at night on guard, whether from curiosity to examine and return it in the morning, or to keep it. Had he been at that place—not going on guard—and picked it up and examined it from curiosity and laid it down, nothing wrong could be charged. It was not an infantry arm with which he was familiar, and he might have had some curiosity to examine it. Going out on guard for the night, whence he would return to the same place, his statement is by no means incredible—that he took it with him intending to return it.

But even if at the end of two terms of faithful service, including the whole period of the war, on seeing this old pistol he formed the purpose of taking it as a souvenir of his service, it seems to me a venial offense, no more than numberless good soldiers did, and that the sentence of dishonorable discharge, in view of his military service and good character as a soldier, was cruel and undeserved. The other parts of the sentence were much more than adequate punishment.

Mr. Ryan has been my neighbor ever since the war. He is an honest, respectable man, who has the warm regard of all who know him. For nearly twenty years he has been a member of our city police, and I know that all of our citizens who have had anything to do with our municipal government would commend him in the highest terms.

As age is approaching and children and grandchildren are growing up about him he feels keenly the disgrace and, as he thinks, injustice of resting under the stain of a dishonorable discharge from his military service, so long extended and creditably performed. If I can interest you in this matter, so as to secure what I think is but tardy justice, I shall be extremely gratified.

Very sincerely, yours,

WM. LOCHREN.

Hon. LOREN FLETCHER,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1547) to extend the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court of appeals, eighth circuit, over certain suits now pending therein on appeal and writ of error from the United States court in the Indian Territory.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court of appeals for the eighth judicial circuit be, and is hereby, extended to all suits at law or equity now pending therein upon writ of error to or appeal from the United States court in the Indian Territory in all cases wherein such writ of error or appeal would have vested jurisdiction in said circuit court of appeals but for the act of Congress approved March 1, 1895, entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of additional judges of the United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, is this reported from the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is.

Mr. DINGLEY. I should like to hear the report read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. TERRY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration the bill (S. 1547) entitled "An act to extend the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court of appeals, eighth circuit, over certain suits now pending therein on appeals and writ of error from the United States court in the Indian Territory," and beg leave to report the same to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The act of March 1, 1895, entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of additional judges of the United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," organized a court of appeals for said Territory, to have jurisdiction of certain cases theretofore appealable to the circuit court of appeals of the eighth circuit, but omitted to insert a saving clause on the subject of appeals and writs of error sued out before the passage of said act to said court of appeals of the eighth circuit. The present bill is designed to remedy such omission and to apply to all cases now pending in said eighth circuit court of appeals upon writ of error to or appeal from the United States court in the Indian Territory in all cases wherein such writ of error or appeal would have vested jurisdiction in said circuit court of appeals but for the passage of said act of March 1, 1895.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TERRY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ST. LOUIS, OKLAHOMA AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 67) authorizing the St. Louis, Oklahoma and Southern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the St. Louis, Oklahoma and Southern Railway Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma, be, and the same is hereby, authorized and invested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, owning, equipping and operating, using and maintaining a railway and telegraph and telephone line through the Indian and Oklahoma Territories, beginning at a point to be selected by said railway company at or near the town of Claremore, in the Cherokee Nation, Indian Territory, and running thence in a westerly and southerly direction, over the most practicable and feasible route, through or near the Cherokee, Creek, Seminole, and Chickasaw Nations, Indian Territory, and Pottawatomie Reserve, Oklahoma, to a point on the Red River at or near Willis, Ind. T., and from thence through the State of Texas to a point at or near Aransas Pass, State of Texas, with the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turn-outs, sidings, and extensions as said company may deem to its interests to construct and maintain along and upon the right of way and depot grounds herein provided for, with the right also of locating, constructing, owning, equipping and operating, using and maintaining a branch line of railway from a point on the main line to be selected by said company over the most practicable and feasible route southwesterly through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, to a point at or near Purcell, Chickasaw Nation, Indian Territory, thence southwesterly to the northerly side of Wilbarger County, State of Texas, and from thence to the east line of the Territory of New Mexico, and thence through New Mexico to a point at or near El Paso, State of Texas, with the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turn-outs, sidings, and extensions as said company may deem to its interests to construct and maintain along and upon the right of way and depot grounds herein provided for.

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a railway, for its main line and branch line, and for no other purpose, a right of way 100 feet in width through said Indian territories and Territory of Oklahoma, and to take and use a strip of land 200 feet in width, with a length of 3,000 feet, in addition to right of way, for stations, for every 10 miles of road, with the right to use such additional ground where there are heavy cuts or fills as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed, not exceeding 100 feet in width on each side of said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no more than said addition of land shall be taken for any one station: Provided further, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be sold by the company, and they shall not be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railway, telegraph, and telephone lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be used, such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall have been taken.

SEC. 3. That before said railway shall be constructed through any lands held by individual occupants according to the laws, customs, and usages of any of the Indian nations or tribes through which it may be constructed, or by allotments under any law of the United States or agreement with the Indians, full compensation shall be made to such occupants for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of such railway. In case of failure to make amicable settlement with any occupant, such compensation shall be determined by the appraisement of three disinterested referees, to be appointed one (who shall act as chairman) by the President, one by the chief of the nation to which said occupant belongs, or, in case of an allottee, by said allottee or by his duly authorized guardian or representative, and one by said railway company, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe, before a district judge, clerk of a district court, or United States commissioner, an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their award to and filed with the Secretary of the Interior within sixty days from the completion thereof; and a majority of said referees shall be competent to act in case of the absence of a member, after due notice. And upon the failure of either party to make such appointment within thirty days after the appointment made by the President, the vacancy shall be filled by the district judge of any United States court in the Indian Territory, or the Territory of Oklahoma, upon the application of the other party. The chairman of said board shall appoint the time and place for all hearings within the nation to which such occupant belongs. Each of said referees shall receive for his services the sum of $4 per day for each day they are engaged in the trial of any case submitted to them under this act, with mileage at 5 cents per mile. Witnesses shall receive the usual fees allowed by the courts of said nations and the courts of Oklahoma Territory. Costs, including compensation of the referees, shall be made a part of the award and be paid by such railway company. In case the referees can not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award. Either party being dissatisfied with the finding of the referees shall have the right, within ninety days after making the award and notice of the same, to appeal by original petition to any district court in the Indian Territory or Oklahoma Territory, which court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the subject-matter of said petition. If, upon the hearing of said appeal, the judgment of the court shall be for a larger sum than the award of the referees, the cost of said appeal shall be adjudged against the railway company. If the judgment of the court shall be for the same sum as the award of the referees, then the cost shall be adjudged against the appellant. If the judgment of the court shall be for a smaller sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages. When proceedings have been commenced in court, the railway company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of the railway.

SEC. 4. That said railway company shall not charge the inhabitants of said Territories a greater rate of freight than the rate authorized by the laws of the State of Kansas for services for transportation of the same kind: Provided, That passenger rates on said railway shall not exceed 3 cents per mile. Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the charges for freight and passengers on said railway, and of messages on said telegraph and telephone lines, until a State government or governments shall exist in said Territories within the limits of which said railway, or a part thereof, shall be located; and then such State government or governments shall be authorized to fix and regulate the cost of transportation of persons and freights within their respective limits by said railway; but Congress expressly reserves the right to fix and regulate, at all times, the cost of such transportation by said railway or said company whenever such transportation shall extend from one State into another, or shall extend into more than one State: Provided, however, That the rate of such transportation of passengers, local or interstate, shall not exceed the rate above expressed: And provided further, That said railway company shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and until such rate is fixed by law the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation.

SEC. 5. That said railway company shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the particular nations or tribes or individuals through whose lands said line may be located, the sum of $50, in addition to compensation provided for in this act for property taken and damages done to individual occupants by the construction of the railway, for each mile of railway that it may construct in said Territories, said payments to be made in installments of $500 as each 10 miles of road is graded: Provided, That if the general council of either of the nations or tribes through whose land said railway may be located shall, within four months after the filing of maps of definite location as set forth in section 6 of this act, dissent from the allowance provided for in this section, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Interior, then all compensation to be paid to such dissenting nation or tribe under the provisions of this act shall be determined as provided in section 3 for the determination of the compensation to be paid to the individual occupant of lands, with the right of appeal to the courts upon the same terms, conditions, and requirements as therein provided: Provided further, That the amount awarded or adjudged to be paid by the said railway company for dissenting nation or tribe shall be in lieu of the compensation that said nation or tribe would be entitled to receive under the foregoing provisions. Said company shall also pay, so long as said Territories are owned and occupied by the Indians, to the Secretary of the Interior the sum of $15 per annum for each mile of railway it shall construct in the said Territories. The money paid to the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act shall be apportioned by him in accordance with the laws and treaties now in force among the different nations and tribes according to the number of miles of railway that may be constructed by said railway company through their lands: Provided, That Congress shall have the right, so long as said lands are occupied and possessed by said nations or tribes, to impose such additional taxes upon said railway as it may deem just and proper for their benefit; and any Territory or State hereafter formed through which said railway shall have been established may exercise the like power as to such part of said railway as may lie within its limits. Said railway company shall have the right to survey and locate its railway immediately after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located lines through said Territories to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and also to be filed in the office of the principal chiefs of each of the nations or tribes through whose lands said railway may be located; and after the filing of said maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company: Provided, That when a map showing any portion of said railway company's located line is filed as herein provided for, said company shall commence grading said located line within six months thereafter or such location shall be void; and said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior in sections of 25 miles before construction of any such section shall be begun.

SEC. 7. That the officers, servants, and employees of said company necessary to the construction and management of said railway shall be allowed to reside, while so engaged, upon such right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with said intercourse laws.

SEC. 8. That said railway company shall build at least 50 miles of its railway in said Territory within three years after the passage of this act, and complete the remainder thereof within five years thereafter, or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built; that said railway company shall construct and maintain continually all fences, road and highway crossings, and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

SEC. 9. That the said St. Louis, Oklahoma and Southern Railway Company shall accept this right of way upon the express condition, binding upon itself, its successors and assigns, that they will neither aid, advise, nor assist in any effort looking toward the changing or extinguishing the present tenure of the Indians in their lands, and will not attempt to secure from the Indian nations or tribes any further grant of land or its occupancy than is hereinbefore provided for: Provided, That any violation of the conditions mentioned in this section shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights and privileges of said railway company under this act.

SEC. 10. That all mortgages executed by said railway company, conveying any portion of its railway, with its franchises, that may be constructed in said Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, shall be recorded in the Department of the Interior, and the record thereof shall be evidence and notice of their execution and shall convey all rights and property of said company as therein expressed.

SEC. 11. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, or alter this act; and the right of way herein and hereby granted shall not be assigned or transferred in any form whatever prior to the construction and completion of the railway except as to mortgages or other liens that may be given or secured thereon to aid in the construction thereof.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

On page 1, line 11, strike out the words "or near the town of Claremore," and add the following: "and between Claremore and Sapulpa, on the St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad."

In line 12, on page 1, after the word "Cherokee," add the following: "and Creek"; also in line 12, change the word "nation" to the word "nations."

On page 2, line 14, before the word "the" add the words "or near."

On page 2, line 15, after the word "Territory," add the following: "to a point at or near Stonewall"; also on same page, in line 16, strike out the following words: "and Pottowatomie Reserve, Oklahoma"; and on same page, line 27, after the word "route," add the following: "between Okmulkee and Sasakwa and running."

Line 27, strike out "Territory."

Page 2, line 29, insert after "Territory" "or to intersect the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad at some point between Norman and Ardmore."

On page 3, line 5, substitute the word "one" for the word "two," and in line 6 strike out the word "three" and insert the word "two."

On page 3, line 10, strike out the words "one hundred" and add the word "fifty."

On page 8, line 42, after the word "act," add the following:

"Provided further, That a map showing the entire line of the road in the Indian Territory shall be filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior before the work of construction shall commence."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the vote last taken was laid on the table.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization to present a report and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The resolution authorizing and directing the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization to visit Ellis Island, in New York Harbor, was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution just reported to the House?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask for an explanation.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. For the information of the House, Mr. Speaker, I will state that this is the usual resolution. For the last four or five Congresses it has been customary for the Committee on Immigration, when called upon to suggest new legislation, to make a trip to New York and visit Ellis Island and the immigration station there. This resolution is presented in accordance with that custom. Its object is to enable members to familiarize themselves with the workings of the present system, the operation of existing laws, and to ascertain, by personal observation, what changes, if any, of the present laws and methods of enforcing them are necessary for the protection of our country against what is termed undesirable immigration.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What is the amount of the appropriation you ask?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The appropriation is the same that was asked for by the committee in the last Congress, $560. We ask for that amount because I know that the chairman of the committee in the last Congress said that it was just sufficient to defray the expenses of the trip.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to know why it should cost $560 to go to New York?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It may be that not more than $300 may be necessary, but it is not to be expected that the members of the committee should go into their own pockets to pay the expenses of the trip.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is there any minority report against this?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Oh, no. This is a unanimous request of the committee—a unanimous report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KEM. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Then I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST AGRICULTURAL AND MANUFACTURED PRODUCTS EXPORTED TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report a resolution and to ask for its immediate consideration by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which will be reported to the House.

The resolution directing the Committee on Ways and Means to prepare a report showing in what countries discriminations are made against our agricultural and manufactured products exported to foreign countries was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman will strike out the provision for an expert I shall have to request that it take the usual course.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am unable to hear what the gentleman has said.

The SPEAKER. The House must be in order.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I was stating, Mr. Speaker, that unless the gentleman from Minnesota would consent to strike out that portion of the resolution which provides for the employment of an expert I shall have to ask him to let it take the usual course.

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not consent to that. I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report the substitute in the form which I have presented it to the House. If the gentleman from Georgia objects to the present consideration of the substitute, I then ask unanimous consent that it be referred to the Committee on Accounts, for the reason that it involves an expenditure from the contingent fund of the House, which, I think, could not be made without unanimous consent unless that committee had first considered the resolution. I therefore ask that it be referred to the committee.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I will ask the gentleman if it would not suit him just as well to put this on the Calendar. Is the gentleman's object in referring the resolution to the committee to make it privileged?

Mr. TAWNEY. My object is this: When the resolution comes up for consideration, not having been considered by the Committee on Accounts, I think an objection to its consideration would then lie, no matter where it went, if it had not been considered by that committee; and if it is referred to that committee and reported upon then it can not be subject to that objection when it does come up for consideration; and, therefore, I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I will state to the gentleman that that is not the only objection that can be raised to the matter, and that is not the objection I had in mind. I merely desired, Mr. Speaker, to enter a sort of protest here against the inauguration of a system of procuring experts to do our work. I have, of course, no objection to the gentleman sending the resolution to the Committee on Accounts, which, doubtless, he can do without my consent, but I do object to its being considered in this form and shall oppose it at any time it may come up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Accounts, unless there is objection.

There was no objection, and it was so referred.

NEW POST-OFFICE, WILMINGTON, DEL.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House what progress has been made in the erection of the new post-office at the city of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware; what amount of the appropriation has been expended therefor; what amount, if any, has been used in the payment of salaries to superintendents, clerks, supervisors, or others; also, whether the work is now in progress or in a state of suspension, and, if the latter, whether any of these salaries were continued to be paid during such suspension, and what are the reasonable probabilities as to the time of the completion of the aforesaid building.

The resolution was adopted.

NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I am requested by the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce to ask that the memorial which I send to the desk be read to the House and then referred to the appropriate committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The memorial urging legislation in favor of the early construction of the Nicaragua Canal was read, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LAND-GRANT PATENTS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report on H. R. 5474, and ask that it be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, retaining its privilege.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the subject of the report?

Mr. LACEY. It is in regard to extending the limitation as to suits to cancel or annul patents for land grants.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for further consideration of the pending appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for further consideration of the pending bill. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, beginning on line 12, strike out the words "For the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children, maintenance, including repairs, $9,900."

Amend the amendment by striking out the words "including repairs."

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, it is desirable that we should come to some understanding at this time as to how much longer the pending motion shall be debated before we take a vote.

Mr. STEELE. Let us vote now.

Mr. GROUT. I want to say a few words myself before the vote is taken, and for the purpose of ascertaining what other gentlemen may desire to be heard I now ask unanimous consent that debate upon the pending amendment be limited to twenty minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I may as well submit at this point what I desire to say on this subject. I hope I shall have the attention of the committee, because I wish to speak of facts that are already before us. It has been stated distinctly to this committee that the board of children's guardians have no control by law over any children except such as have been committed to their care by the courts. Gentlemen will please bear that in mind. Now, it is moved to strike out this item for destitute colored women and children, for the purpose of later putting this institution, with others, into the hands of the board of children's guardians.

When that motion is made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER], as I understand it will be, if this motion includes this provision of the bill I shall raise the point of order, because the 100 little colored waifs that are cared for in this institution have never gone through the courts, and you can not put them into the hands of the board of children's guardians until you have run them through the courts. There is no authority of law for it. Therefore, this motion contemplates an absolute absurdity, and an impossibility so far as regards this item in the bill, and I repeat, that when the motion is made, if it includes this institution, I shall make a point of order.

But there is another question to be considered. Why remit these various institutions to the board of children's guardians? Who asks it? The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] asks it, but who else asks it? This committee heard a labored and convincing argument from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on yesterday against the proposition, and in that argument he read certain statements made by the president of the board of children's guardians. Did you learn from that gentleman's statement that he wanted this done? No; you learned from him that he did not want it done. Let me remind the committee of what he said:

STATEMENT OF MR. SIMON WOLF, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF CHILDREN'S GUARDIANS AND CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE GERMAN ORPHAN ASYLUM.

Mr. CANNON. In the present condition of charitable work in the District and of legislation covering the power of the board of children's guardians, what would be the practical effect for this fiscal year of a failure to appropriate for the utilization of the various private charities?

Mr. WOLF. A calamity for those institutions without conferring adequate authority upon the board of children's guardians. Before any such radical step could be taken further legislation is indispensably necessary—

Further legislation necessary. Can we provide it here? Confessedly not. We are engaged upon an appropriation bill. We must take the laws as they are and make appropriations accordingly—as the board is in a state of evolution. It has to propagate its ideas by practical work, and while we have accomplished much, and while primarily we claim that all appropriations given by the Government for the care of indigent children in the District of Columbia should go through us, we are not so blind as to ignore the tradition, sentiment, and feelings of a large number of well-disposed, well-meaning, kind-hearted, and charitable people.

Mr. CANNON. What would be the effect (without further legislation) upon the children who will be really entitled to relief, of the withholding of appropriation from the various private institutions?

Mr. WOLF. I think it would cripple private institutions and prove a great harm to many deserving people who, from a feeling of religion, habits, or traditions, do not like to have their misfortunes dragged into the public courts, and thus, while a principle would be observed, much practical harm might ensue for the present.

Mr. CANNON. Then, I understand you, from the standpoint of complete administration, through strictly governmental agencies, or Government appropriations, under existing conditions, without further legislation, such appropriations are not desirable.

Mr. WOLF. Not at present.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that the gentleman from Vermont be allowed to go on without limit.

Mr. CANNON. I will rise to oppose the pending proposition, and yield my time to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GROUT. I thank the gentleman from Illinois.

Now, this Committee of the Whole is, I feel, under a misapprehension and somewhat in a state of confusion as to these amendments, and may not do exactly what it wants to do. Let us, in a practical way, find out what we want to do. Let me say to gentlemen of the committee, if you want to strike out all the institutions that are strictly sectarian, which have been designated in number as six, then vote to strike them out. You have done so with one already—the St. John's Orphanage. You have also struck out an institution which is nonsectarian—the German Orphan Asylum. This Mr. Wolf, from whom I have just read, who is a Jew, and was formerly president of the German Orphan Asylum, now either its treasurer or secretary, I have forgotten which, says:

Every safeguard is thrown around the children of the German Orphan Asylum, which institution is strictly nonsectarian, having all shades of religious opinion represented on the board.

Now, if you want merely to strike out sectarian institutions, do so on motions which will be submitted; if no one else submits them, I will do so. Mr. Chairman, I think I know what they are.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I should like to understand the position of the gentleman on the motion now pending. Does he object to striking out the institution to which the motion applies?

Mr. GROUT. I do, most certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And the gentleman does not object to the others?

Mr. GROUT. As to certain others I do. I would have the German Orphan Asylum restored to the bill. It is wholly unsectarian. Then, as to the other thirteen charities which are private institutions, if you are willing to appropriate public money to them provided they open their doors by a change of their articles of association or their charters so that the public can as a matter of right enter and inspect the institutions and supervise the expenditures—I refer to institutions which are confessedly nonsectarian; that is, not made up of persons of any particular form of religious belief—then leave them in the bill, including the German Asylum, which can be left in the bill in the House by refusing to agree to the amendment of the committee.

If, on the other hand, you want to confuse the question as much as possible—if you want to make a great noise and really accomplish nothing—vote for the Hainer amendment. It will leave the whole business in a magnificent muddle, which will be discreditable to the intelligence of this House. If also you should not want to strike out these sectarian charities, then vote not to do so and leave them in the bill. In this way the whole matter can be practically and fairly disposed of.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask my friend whether or not in principle this German Orphan Asylum and the Colored Home are not substantially in the same category with the Smithsonian Institution?

Mr. GROUT. Practically they are, especially the Colored Home, because it has been the special care of the Government from the first. It could not have had an existence except by act of Congress. It can not subsist for a day without the help of the Government. It has no contributions from wealthy friends elsewhere. From the very nature of the case it can not have. It is practically on the basis that the gentleman suggests, although technically still a private institution. I must confess that for one I would bring them under this amendment which I propose; which is, that before they can touch a dollar of the money appropriated in this bill they shall open their doors to inspection; there shall be no technical barrier to full Government supervision of every feature of the administration and every item of expenditure.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this item for the Home for Aged Colored Women should be seriously considered by this committee. As was well said by a gentleman on the floor yesterday, this is a national trust. It is a trust, too, established by the loving hand of the immortal Lincoln, whose undying memory we are about to celebrate throughout this broad land. It is an institution that grew out of one of the great classic and heroic struggles of our history. No shrine established by the hands of Lincoln, no charity recommended by his name, should ruthlessly be assailed. Nothing he loved was born of sectarianism, but of the mighty religion of humanity, the kindly impulse of a mighty heart. I cordially hope that this committee will leave unspoliated this item with reference to the Home for Aged Colored Women. [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. GROUT] for his explanation of this matter. If the gentleman would read the letter of Dr. Mackay Smith he would reiterate what he said about restoring in this bill the appropriation for St. John's Orphanage.

Now I will send to the desk and have this letter from the Rev. Dr. Smith read.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman will permit me, I said nothing about restoring St. John's Orphanage and the appropriation for that.

Mr. WHEELER. Well, I understood the gentleman to say St. John's Orphanage, but regret to find he did not mean it.

Mr. Chairman, I will read this letter myself. It was written by the very eminent divine, the pastor of St. John's Parish, Dr. Mackay Smith. The writer says:

EDITOR POST: So much misapprehension was shown in the debate in Congress regarding St. John's Orphanage that it seems proper to correct several of the statements by giving the exact facts. The authorities of St. John's parish have no power over or responsibility for St. John's Orphanage. It is a corporation entirely independent of the vestry.

This shows that the orphanage is not what can properly be called a sectarian institution, and further evidence of this will be seen as I read. The writer further says:

Although supported mainly by members of St. John's Parish, it yet draws contributions from Christian men and women of other parishes. While its officers come from St. John's, it is more than a parish institution and makes larger claims on the community.

It rightly does this, for it throws its doors open to receive inmates of all nationalities and creeds.

I think this fact is conclusive evidence that the orphanage is by no means a sectarian institution. Dr. Mackay Smith then says:

It makes no distinction between Protestant, Roman Catholic, or infidel, but asks only what is the need of each, and whether there is room to receive any needy case.

I beg to ask the House if these facts would indicate that St. John's Orphanage is of a sectarian character?

Dr. Smith then corrects a wrong impression regarding the income of the orphanage. He says:

It has no regular income of $10,000 or half that sum. Last year the income included a bequest from Mr. B. H. Warder of $5,000, but this, of course, was not used as income, but mainly applied to the reduction of debt.

The writer then tells us of the commendable economy with which St. John's orphans are maintained and educated. He says:

It claims to support its inmates in health and happiness on less money per capita than almost any institution of a similar kind in the country. It costs less than $50 a year to support an orphan.

Showing that the cost of educating, maintaining, and clothing the children in this orphanage is less than one-third the cost under the board of children's guardians. Dr. Smith then explained how this economy is possible. He says:

Few institutions, if any, can show such a record; and as the children are well fed and contented, it is obvious that only the most rigid economy can effect such a result. I might add to this that the orphanage could not produce such a record had it not at its head a lady who gives her services free of charge, devoting her life to these children and acting toward them as a true mother. She supports nearly 100 boys and girls on a sum that in most institutions would keep hardly 50.

Mr. BRUMM. May I ask the gentleman from Alabama from what he is reading?

Mr. WHEELER. I am reading a communication from the Rev. Mackay Smith.

Mr. BRUMM. Who is he?

Mr. WHEELER. The pastor of St. John's Parish.

Mr. BRUMM. Oh! Good authority!

Mr. WHEELER. Further he says:

We claim, therefore, that St. John's Orphanage is a blessing to this city, being a model in the way it is conducted, the economy of its management, and the devotion of its head. Without it scores of poor children, many of them from States or towns remote from Washington, would be destitute. That such an institution should be singled out for attack in Congress is certainly very strange.

These facts should appeal to every man in the United States and certainly to the Representatives upon this floor. It is shown that St. John's Parish extends its generosity to poor children, many of whom, as Dr. Smith tells us, comes from States and towns remote from Washington, and he also tells us that were it not for this orphanage many of them would be destitute.

If the appropriation to St. John's is denied, the children now in their charge, or a part of them at least, will have to go unprovided for, unless the patrons of the home who have poured out their bounteous generosity are able to contribute still further for this praiseworthy object. If they are unable to contribute to the full amount required for the best care of these children, the little orphans will be compelled to suffer, or else they will have to be sent through the police courts and remitted to the board of children's guardians. In that event the least possible cost for their board would, as Mrs. MacFarland told us, be $96 a year, and other expenses would amount to $157 a year, while under the present system the entire cost of each of these orphans to the Government is but $18 per year. I appeal to reason and beg Congress to remember that upon our action depends the welfare of all the orphans, the indigent, and unfortunate in the District of Columbia. [Applause.]

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, in the debate on yesterday there was some suggestion made by members on the floor about an "underlying principle" in connection with this matter, and the members of this House who were prepared to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] as to the provision in this bill for the Colored Home, and had voted and were prepared to vote against other institutions referred to in the foregoing and the following paragraphs of the bill, were taunted with inconsistency. Now, I voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska that struck out the provision for St. John's Parish Orphan Association and also that which struck out the provision for the German Orphan Asylum. I shall vote, however, against his amendment to strike out the provision for the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children. In doing so I am convinced that I am adhering strictly to the underlying principle to which reference is made, and that there is no inconsistency whatever in my attitude or in my vote.

In the first place, I was astonished when I found that in this appropriation bill there were contained provisions carrying appropriations for sectarian institutions. It was news to me that the United States Congress had ever violated the spirit and the principle of the United States Constitution by making any provision whatever for sectarian institutions. The underlying principle, admitting of no exception in any case whatever, is embodied in the spirit of our Constitution, and is that no appropriation of public money should be made for sectarian institutions.

As to private institutions other than sectarian, the principle is almost as broad, but it admits of exceptions; and it is an exceptional case where a national association has been incorporated by United States charter for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of receiving these various bounties from the United States Government that it has received from the time of President Lincoln up to the present time for the purpose of taking charge of the wards of the nation who have sought refuge here. It is an exception to the general rule which should meet with our approval, for such an institution approaches closely to a quasi public corporation. The colored people having been freed by the National Government and placed upon the world without money, without education, and in abject want, a duty devolved upon the National Government. At the close of the war the capital city of the nation had become a place of refuge for the destitute colored women and children made destitute and kept in ignorance by an institution fostered by the laws of the nation. If it was right when Lincoln was President of the United States that we should adopt such a provision as was adopted in chartering this association, it is right and proper that we should appropriate the money to continue its operations. It receives no other than Government support, and it would be a crime to close its doors. The amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska will therefore not have my vote, although I shall vote for every amendment that strikes out appropriations for sectarian institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The twenty minutes allowed for debate have expired.

Mr. GROUT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] be heard.

Mr. CANNON. Five minutes will be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I crave the attention of the committee for five minutes, while I inquire "where we are at." The gentleman who last addressed the committee [Mr. FAIRCHILD] announced before he sat down that he should vote against every sectarian appropriation in this bill, but he stated substantially that he would vote against the amendment to strike out this particular appropriation for colored children. I say to my friend there is no sectarian appropriation in this bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. That is a fact.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, that is so. I will put into the RECORD the text of the law that creates the superintendent of charities. I referred to it yesterday, and I will quote it in full, as follows:

For the purpose of securing a more equitable and efficient expenditure of the several sums appropriated "for charities" there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, some thoroughly experienced or otherwise suitable person, not a resident of the District of Columbia, whose duties shall be to formulate for the purpose of the expenditures for charities in said District such a system or plan of organized charities for said District as will by means of consolidation, combination, or other direction, in his judgment, best secure the objects contemplated by the several institutions and associations for which such appropriations are made, and for the other charitable work of the District, with the least interference each with the other, or misapplication of effort or expenditure and without duplication of charitable work or expenditure; and all such appropriations shall be expended for the purposes indicated, under the general direction of said superintendent, and in conformity, as near as may be, with such system or plan, subject to the approval of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia. And it shall also be the duty of said superintendent to examine into the character of the administration of said institutions and associations, and the condition, sufficiency, and needs of the buildings occupied for such charitable purposes, and also to ascertain in each case the amount contributed from private sources for support and construction, the number of paid employees, and the number of inmates received and benefited by the sums appropriated by Congress, and to recommend such changes and modifications therein as in his judgment will best secure economy, efficiency, and the highest attainable results in the administration of charities in the District of Columbia. And said superintendent shall, from time to time, report in detail to the Commissioners of the District, who shall communicate the same with their estimates for appropriations to the next session of Congress, his doings hereunder, together with such estimates and recommendations for the future as in his judgment will best promote the charitable work of the District. All estimates submitted hereunder shall be included in the regular Annual Book of Estimates.

(Act of August 6, 1890.)

OFFICE OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., July 13, 1891.

Ordered, That hereafter all vouchers for expenditures of appropriations for charitable and reformatory institutions and purposes which receive aid from the District of Columbia shall be submitted to the superintendent of charities for review and approval, and when so examined and approved be transmitted by that officer to the auditor of the District of Columbia.

By order.

WM. TINDALL, Secretary.

Under that law all these charities are superintended. There is power of visitation and report, under the commission, with full accounting for all expenditures, and it comes to this, that this class of children that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] so feelingly alluded to this morning, the poor colored waifs, will be turned out under the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER]. God knows I have as much sympathy for them as anybody, but it is also true that the poor white waifs will be turned out. Now, I believe in fair play to the man and brother. I will give to the man of African descent just as fair play as to the Caucasian, but I will hold them equal before the law.

I said there is no sectarian appropriation here. We have no Government orphan asylum to house this class of people. The Government, in conscience and in right, must support these helpless people; and as we have no hospital, pending the time that we get a place, owned by the Government, we hire these people who have the hospitals to do certain work, namely, to help take care of these children, under the superintendence of United States officials, supervised by the District Commissioners, accounted for under the strict accounting systems of the Government; and yet gentlemen are flushed by the speeches of individuals who talk about sectarian appropriations.

They run from a shadow when there is no substance to make the shadow. They create a shadow in the mind, and then flee from it, and vote upon a speech, instead of upon a reality. They come around with bated breath and say: "Why, you must not strike these poor colored children out." No, I do not think you ought to strike them out. But somebody else says with bated breath: "Why, you have stricken out the German Orphan Asylum. You must not strike that out, because you will antagonize all the Germans, and you will jump out of the frying pan into the fire." Oh, for the spirit of God to put a little backbone and common sense into this House! Quit fighting the shadows and come up and look at the substance. Under the law creating the children's board of guardians, they are getting ready to take care of a large share of this work. Simon Wolf says: "We are not ready yet, we are not equipped, and it would be a calamity, a mistake akin to a crime, to refuse to support these children." That is what he says. What else do you want? Why, if one were risen from the dead you would not believe him, however wise and just he might be, if you refuse now to look into the facts. Gentlemen, I think I am as cowardly as anybody, perhaps. I am too much of a coward to do wrong here and be chased by a shadow, when in God's justice and chancery there is no sectarian appropriation in this bill anywhere.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon this amendment, by order of the committee, is exhausted.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for just a very few moments. It is hardly fair to take up the entire twenty minutes on that side.

Mr. GROUT. I hope the gentleman may have the time. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I do not care for more than five minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want five or ten minutes myself.

The CHAIRMAN. If somebody will make the proposition the Chair will put it to the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will ask for ten minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] wants time on this amendment. Several other gentlemen want time, and it seems to me it would be better to conform to the agreement. I see the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] also wants to be heard.

Mr. CANNON. Extend the time twenty minutes.

Mr. GROUT. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be closed in twenty minutes.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. What division of that twenty minutes do you want?

Mr. CANNON. Make it half and half.

Mr. GROUT. One-half in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] and the other against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] asks that the time for debate upon this paragraph be extended for twenty minutes, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] and the remaining half by those opposed to his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, as I desire to close debate in favor of the amendment, I suggest that the opposition take their ten minutes now.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to speak against the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am pained to find it necessary to participate in this debate; but I would be cowardly, indeed, knowing what I do of these institutions and the law governing them, if I did not take a part in this discussion.

Until this Congress I had been for ten years a member of the subcommittee that framed the District of Columbia appropriation bills, and have visited nearly every institution in the city of Washington, some of them several times. If I were a Catholic, which I am not; if I were an A. P. A., which I am not; if the thunders of the Vatican or of the Inquisition of Spain, or any other secret organization, tried to chain my lips I would speak out now, because I believe it is my duty, and would vote against those amendments.

In the first place, when the act of 1892 was passed creating the board of children's guardians, concerning which I have no unkind word, a bill that passed both Houses of Congress without debate, not one member of the House Committee on Appropriations had any knowledge of its existence until our attention was brought to it when we went to make up the District of Columbia appropriation bill. When that law confronted us, every lawyer on the committee, without reference to politics, said it is our duty to put this in bulk, under our rules, under the board of children's guardians; but we also agreed that the board of children's guardians, under that law, as I pointed out to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] yesterday morning, could not be expended on these children. We gave it in bulk, and it went to the Senate.

The Senate saw the same difficulty, and they amended our bill, giving 70 per cent directly to the institutions and 30 per cent to the board of children's guardians. When we met in conference that was changed, so that we gave 60 per cent directly to those institutions having children in care and 40 per cent to the board of children's guardians. Under that arrangement, so absolutely right were we, it turned out that it could not be expended by the board of children's guardians, and that over $7,000 remained in their hands at the end of the fiscal year, which they could not, under the law, apply to the use for which it was appropriated by Congress. We have let it run along at 60 and 40 per cent, hoping that in time all would come within the control of the board of children's guardians.

The Committee on Appropriations has all the time desired to let this come into the hands of one board but for the reason that I explained yesterday; and no man respecting his certificate as a practicing lawyer in any court of this country dare say that under that law of 1892 and the facts, if all of this money had gone to the board of children's guardians, that it could be expended under the act for the benefit of those orphans. Why? Because the law provides that it shall be applied to certain ones named in this act of 1892, sent there in a particular way by a court. When the law was passed hundreds of children never sent there by a court, were taken there by a father when the mother was dead, taken there by a guardian when both parents were dead, brought there by the police—children who had neither father nor mother, and children who will never know who mother or father was.

These children could not be reached by the law creating the board of children's guardians. They are sent by no court, as they are brought to these institutions, and children go by order of a court under the law of 1892, when the board of children's guardians can take them up and care for them; but until that is done the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] strikes with an iron hand these orphans and insults these God-anointed institutions, each and all of them, who are caring for these little children. [Loud applause.] Gentlemen of the American Congress, when I see a helpless child, not cared for, on the ground or in the gutter, and kindly women, whether in white garb or cowls, or whether infidelity has stooped down to lift it up and clasp it to his or her breast, as I have said in another place, God give me a conscience that will keep me from looking up to see whether he or she is doing it under the cross or under the crescent.

My warrant for sanctioning such an act was planted here in my breast, not by priest, not by oath-bound associations, but by my Maker and my mother. [Loud applause.] Strike if you will, gentlemen, but strike knowing what you are doing. My eloquent friend from New York speaks about the American Congress doing this. Gentlemen, you are not the Congress now. You are the Washington city council appropriating this money, half of it out of its treasury and half out of the Treasury of the United States, the District's portion under the law. We are acting as the council of a city that has no orphan asylum, has no house or building to take care of them. We are sitting here together saying that we will appropriate this money and give a little here and there to these institutions that are taking care of these children. I have no purpose to serve in this, gentlemen, but to do my duty.

I know what these institutions are doing without reference to creed, and I wish that those gentlemen who are rushing here before an imaginary whirlwind would go and see these orphans and other destitute persons as they are being cared for. When you do that, gentlemen, you will tread gently in sacred places and will hesitate long before you strike down as with bludgeons those who should have the approval of the hearts and consciences of every man here to protect and sustain these benevolent institutions. [Applause.]

Until buildings are erected to care for them you have no other remedy, and you only force the Senate to save what you would destroy.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I wish this committee to understand that the gentleman, be he from Iowa, from Illinois, or from any other State, has no monopoly of all the goodness and conscience in this House. He is not the only person who is not a Catholic or a member of any secret association. I want to say to my friend now, as I have already stated, that I am not here as the advocate of any secret cabal. I am not a member of any so-called patriotic order or association. I am not a member of the Catholic Church, although I was baptized in it and have for that church and its good works the highest and deepest reverence, neither am I now, nor have I at any time, been a member of the American Protective Association nor of any kindred society. But, Mr. Chairman, neither the impassioned eloquence of my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] nor the calling up of the shroud of the sacred and martyred President of the United States, should divert this committee from its plain duty or from the facts.

Gentlemen say that we ought to vote against striking out the provision in the bill for this institution because the bill incorporating it was signed by President Lincoln. President Lincoln signed many a bill for the incorporation of institutions; shall we therefore vote the money of the people to those institutions indiscriminately? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says there is no sectarian appropriation in this bill, and he tells us that we are going through an evolution. I ask him whether he has not gone through a process of evolution himself, since only a short year ago, under his leadership, we made a gallant though unavailing fight against similar appropriations contained in the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for an answer?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have but ten minutes and the gentleman had twenty. In that Indian appropriation bill, Mr. Chairman, there was carried nearly a half million dollars for sectarian Indian schools, and it was urged as a justification of that appropriation that the Government had no schools of its own. Under the leadership of the gentleman from Illinois the fight against those sectarian appropriations was made. Has the gentleman gone through a course of evolution since that time?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield now for an answer to that question?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to my friend that the two cases are not similar, as he very well knows, and in the case he speaks of, that of the Indian appropriation bill last year, I neither sought nor advocated interfering with existing schools except as the Government should gradually be able to supply schools of its own.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman was not restricted then by the rule which he observes now. He fought then for the principle for which I am contending here, and for which he ought to be contending by my side to-day. Then, again——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield again, and if necessary I will ask to have his time extended?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I am for the principle that the gentleman advocates by his speech to-day, but there is nothing in this bill to apply the principle to. That is the difference.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no distinction between the two cases. Neither the gentleman from Illinois nor any other gentleman here, be his tongue gifted with all the logic and the lore of all the ages, can distinguish between appropriating for a Catholic school teaching Indian children and appropriating for one of these institutions, for instance, St. Ann's Infant Asylum, which teaches white children in this District. He can not distinguish between the two cases, and I appeal to the gentleman who insists that he has such wonderful courage to stand up here before the American people and face the consequences of his acts. Do not undertake for one moment to hoodwink any portion of the people of the United States. You can not do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I yield again.

Mr. CANNON. In reply to the gentleman's appeal I have to say that we still utilize the Catholic Indian schools, though less and less every year, as we are able to supply Government schools to take their place, and I think that is the proper course. I will say to him now that we only hire these private institutions to care for these orphans because we have no institutions of our own in which to care for them, but we are following the policy as rapidly as possible, through the board of children's guardians, of supplying a Government service for this purpose. As to one class of these children the board of children's guardians does supply that service now, but we have not evolved that board sufficiently to take care of all these children, and, rather than turn the children out, I will hire an Episcopal institution or a Catholic institution, or an infidel institution, if you please, that will take charge of them and care for them. [Applause.]

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is not the question. There is no question here of turning out these children. There is no such proposition as that presented by this amendment—absolutely nothing of the kind.

Mr. WHEELER. Your proposition will practically result in that, though.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman from Illinois says that he is in favor of extending the power of the board of children's guardians. Now, my amendment proposes to give that board the money, which is the real power in the case, and there is absolutely nothing to prevent the board from placing these children where they will. They can place them in this institution or in that institution, and they can pay those institutions for the care which they give to the children. They can take the children out whenever they please, as they have absolute control of children in their charge.

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend say that these children that are in this Colored Home and in other homes, children not committed by the court, are under the jurisdiction of the board of children's guardians?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I say that those children can be committed upon a finding of the facts.

Mr. CANNON. But I ask the gentleman whether they are.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The finding has not yet been made.

Mr. CANNON. Oh!

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. But I ask the gentleman in turn, why should there not be a finding by a competent court that they are children who are destitute, or, using the exact language of the statute, "destitute of suitable homes and adequate means of earning an honest living"? Can any good reason be given, either in the name of sentiment or of practical fact, why there should not be such a determination by competent authority before you spend the public money in the support of these children?

Mr. CANNON. And are no others to be cared for except those who pass through the courts?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That cares for one class mentioned in the act creating the board of children's guardians.

Mr. CANNON. But it does not provide for the other class whom we are seeking to provide for in this very item which the gentleman moves to strike out.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I ask the gentleman to show me a single class of children not contemplated by section 4 of the act providing for the board of children's guardians who are at the same time proper subjects of public charity.

Mr. CANNON. Substantially all the children that are in the various institutions——

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Not so.

Mr. CANNON. Including this one, the Colored Home.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Not so.

Mr. GROUT. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Going right to the motion under consideration, would the gentleman put the children who are now at the Colored Home—over 100 of them—through the courts in order to give the board of guardians control over them?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I would if necessary, certainly. The very fact they are in such an institution is prima facie evidence of the fact they should be under the control of the board of children's guardians and any reasonable court would so hold.

Mr. GROUT. What would you do with the old ladies who are there—20 of them?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Only 11.

Mr. GROUT. Well, 11. What would you do with those old ladies?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I would either have those 11 old ladies taken care of under this appropriation of $13,000, the first item, or I would place them in the Freedman's Hospital, an asylum for which we have already appropriated $22,500. Certainly they can take care of those old ladies with the $35,000 we have appropriated.

Mr. GROUT. Is it not a fact that the board of children's guardians have charge only of children——

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. GROUT. Not old ladies?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. CRAIN rose.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I now yield a moment to my friend from Texas.

Mr. CRAIN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Nebraska whether under the provision for the board of children's guardians he proposes to appropriate for all these beneficiaries now covered by this appropriation bill?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I propose that every dollar included in these appropriati ons be carried over to the appropria tion for the board of children's guardians, to be expended by them in caring for children who come under the law.

Mr. CRAIN. The gentleman has answered me very frankly. Now, upon what basis shall this board of children's guardians distribute this fund?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. They will expend it under the law which I have quoted.

Mr. CRAIN. The gentleman will pardon me; I did not hear him refer to it.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The law provides that this board of children's guardians shall have committed to them—

All children who are destitute of suitable homes and adequate means of earning an honest living; all children abandoned by their parents or guardians; all children of habitually drunken or vicious or unfit parents; all children habitually begging on the streets or from door to door; all children kept in vicious or immoral associations; all children known by their language or life to be vicious or incorrigible.

Now, I say there is no class of children not included in these several classes that are entitled to be a public charge.

Mr. CRAIN. How will this appropriation be apportioned—upon what basis? Shall it be upon the basis of the number of inmates of each hospital or asylum?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The board of children's guardians has the right to make contracts for the care and custody of the children under their charge.

Mr. CRAIN. But I respectfully submit to the gentleman that he is not curing the defect for which he assumes to provide a remedy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CRAIN. I will take the floor in my own time.

Mr. PITNEY. I ask that the gentleman from Nebraska be allowed ten minutes more.

Mr. CRAIN. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto was limited to twenty minutes, of which there remain two minutes, to be occupied by those opposed to the amendment.

Mr. CRAIN. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. As the gentleman from Nebraska, my colleague on the committee [Mr. HAINER], was interrupted a number of times, I ask unanimous consent, as I agreed to do, that he be allowed ten minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I thank the committee for this courtesy.

Mr. CRAIN. One question before the gentleman proceeds. The evil of which he complains, as I understand, is that this money is given to private institutions; and instead of appropriating specifically by this bill for certain institutions, he proposes, as I understand, that we give a sum in the aggregate to be distributed as this board of children's guardians may see proper. Now, if that be the fact, where does the gentleman's remedy come in?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman has evidently misunderstood my motion. I have made no such proposition as that.

Mr. CRAIN. But you said you were going to.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. If I may kindly be permitted to proceed——

Mr. PITNEY. Let me ask one question. The gentleman has read from the law providing that the board of children's guardians may take care of poor children, friendless children, and also children who are incorrigible.

Treating now of the colored children who come under the control of the board of children's guardians, let me ask the gentleman if it is his proposition to mix together in this Colored Home the incorrigible with the merely indigent, unfortunate, or poor children?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly not.

Mr. PITNEY. Then let me ask what is your proposition?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have explained it several times, but it is, in brief, to turn all of the money appropriated for these purposes over to the board of children's guardians, an association which is accountable directly to the United States, and empower it to make proper arrangement for the care and custody of these children, allowing them to put the children where they should be placed, where they can be constantly under their control and subject to their supervision. They may place, under this provision, some of them in one institution of this character and others elsewhere in other institutions. The welfare of the child ought to be, and doubtless will be, considered by this board of children's guardians as of the first consideration.

Mr. PITNEY. Are you aware of any institution in the District of Columbia which is at the disposal of the board of children's guardians, and to which they may send incorrigible colored boys?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Why, they may be sent to the Reform School of the District of Columbia.

Mr. PITNEY. I am informed this morning by one of the trustees of the Colored Home that colored boys can not be placed in the Reform School, and there is no institution in the District where incorrigible colored boys can be placed.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Then, if that be true, it is clearly the duty of Congress, and promptly, to provide a place.

My proposition is simply that there should be no such thing as mixing up Government and private institutions, or Government and private charity. They should be kept separate and distinct at all times. There should be no intermingling one with the other. I hold that Government money should be appropriated only for public purposes and let private institutions subsist by private aid.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa said that no gentleman who prizes his certificate as an attorney will state that any part of this money can be expended by the board of children's guardians. I refer him to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who contends they have already expended 40 per cent of the money appropriated each year with the exception of the first year. I ask this question, then, of plain, practical lawyers who have not practiced in as high courts as the gentleman from Iowa, but real courts, where causes are actually tried—I do not know what courts he has practiced in for the last two or three years, but I ask common, everyday lawyers, who are not boasting about their practice, if this board of children's guardians, under this law, has been able to expend 40 per cent of the appropriation, why has it not the power to expend in a proper case the other 60?

The board complained in the last report that they had not money enough to do the work. There is no such dilemma as the gentleman thinks confronts us, and whatever there is of dispute on this proposition I suggest these joint champions settle it according to the rules of the Marquis of Queensbury, if they prefer it. When they have reached a conclusion among themselves, I will try conclusions with the survivor.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I will yield for a question.

Mr. CRAIN. You do not dispute the proposition that these appropriations are necessary?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Oh, no, of course not; that these worthy dependents must be cared for.

Mr. CRAIN. Well, the gentleman accedes to that statement that the appropriations are necessary. Now I want to ask him simply this: How does he provide for these appropriations at all, if he cuts them out here? He simply moves to strike them all out, although acceding to my statement that they are necessary. If they are necessary, why strike them out? That is a fair proposition.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the country ought to understand exactly what is involved here. My position in reference to the matter is not due to any animosity against any particular institution. I have cheerfully conceded, and concede now, that they may be doing a good work, and that they may be doing all that they claim to be doing. I have no knowledge to the contrary, and therefore make no charge against them.

But gentlemen insist that in all cases there have been full reports. I desire to send to the desk one of their reports, found on page 310 of the Report of the Bureau of Education for 1895, which gives a fair illustration of the "satisfactory character" of these reports; and this, too, made by an association for which large appropriations have been made.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPORT OF THE LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 21, 1895.

DEAR SIR: Your communication, with inclosure, of June 13 duly received and contents noted.

We herewith beg to state that our established principle is to provide for a limited number (200, more or less) of aged inmates of both sexes, without distinction of color or creed.

We solicit and collect from private parties ample food required daily, and in case of deficiency, which often occurs, such is bought out of the funds also collected daily. Clothing is obtained the same way, repaired if necessary, and kept in readiness when wanted.

The daily money collection is mainly to defray expenses, viz, insurance, fuel, gas, medical supplies, beer and liquor, groceries, meat, ice, etc., and for general repairs, done by outside mechanics.

We do not pay wages or hire for inside labor, all performed by ourselves.

Our approximate expenditures yearly are as follows:

Beer and liquor	$1,200
Coal	1,000
Groceries	1,000
Butchers' bills	500
Medical supplies	300
Undertaker's bill	300
Miscellaneous	600
Total yearly	4,900
This year we had to pay insurance for five years	1,096
The approximate valuation of property and buildings, including furniture and fixings	200,000
Moneys received from United States through Congress	42,500
From the District	12,500
Total amount received	55,000

Total number of inmates July 1, 1894		200
Deaths from July 1, 1894, up to June 30, 1895	36
Left of their own accord during the year	15
		51
Remaining		149
Inmates admitted from July 1, 1894, up to June 30, 1895		48
Total inmates July 1, 1895		197

Hoping our above statement will prove satisfactory, at the same time we would be highly pleased should you call to see the progress of our labor.

We remain, with high esteem, your most obedient and humble servants,

LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR.
By Sister ST. DOSITHEE, Superior.

Col. JOHN TRACEY,
Superintendent of Charities.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a sample of the reports which have been made. Gentlemen insist that since appropriations have been made in times past that we have recognized a divided responsibility, the Government partnership with private corporations. The Smithsonian Institution has been mentioned as one of that class.

I grant, Mr. Chairman, that such arrangements have been made, but every one of these arrangements is fraught with a principle of great danger. If we have made mistakes in the past, let us rectify them. We ought certainly to stand on the principle that public funds should be appropriated only for public purposes. We ought not to deviate from that principle one hair's breadth. When we stand on that ground we are impregnable.

If there are any indigent poor or unfortunate in this District, care for them properly. They are proper subjects of public charge; but I oppose, and am unalterably opposed to, the delegation of that high function of government to any sisterhood or brotherhood on the face of the globe. Let us face this matter fairly and squarely; let no man skulk behind our backs here and say that we are opposed to charities. Nothing is further from the truth. But we say that the Government should expend its charities directly; that accountability should go with every dollar of appropriation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN].

Mr. CRAIN. With the consent of the House, I will withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER], to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FARIS. Let it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, beginning with line 12, strike out the words:
"For the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children, maintenance, including repairs, $9,900."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. HAINER of Nebraska) there were—ayes 51, noes 74.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska demanded tellers, but subsequently withdrew the demand.

Accordingly, the amendment of Mr. HAINER of Nebraska was rejected.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Is it necessary to announce in the Committee of the Whole a demand for a yea-and-nay vote in the House upon any amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For St. Ann's Infant Asylum, maintenance, $5,400.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move to strike out the item just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER].

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard upon that motion. Just as I spoke yesterday in behalf of the appropriation for the Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish, I rise now to speak in behalf of this Roman Catholic charity. I for one am not afraid to take my stand in behalf of all these charities, whether they be for white or colored, whether they be for Jew or Gentile. I am in favor of each and every one of these appropriations, whether the institution be under the management of Roman Catholic or Lutheran or Calvinist. I believe that we have the power to give the Government aid which we vouchsafe to these charitable institutions, to the managers of these institutions for apportionment, and I say that the sectarian spirit is manifested by opposition to these appropriations and not by those who favor the giving of this money.

Under the specious plea of being opposed to sectarian institutions, these gentlemen make the most vigorous and persistent attacks upon these charities because they happen to be controlled by particular societies. It is the anti-Catholic spirit, it is the spirit of the A. P. A. which is controlling our deliberations in this committee. For a moment look at the consistency of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER], who has been wielding his battle-ax so vigorously for the last few days. He passes by an appropriation for the Washington Hospital for Foundlings, an appropriation of $6,000 for about 35 inmates, amounting, if I mistake not, to a per capita appropriation of $171.42; but now, because this other charity is said to be Roman Catholic in its management, although it has 135 inmates, at a per capita cost of $41.42, he asks that this appropriation be stricken from the bill.

Why did he not make his opposition to the Washington Home for Foundlings? Why did he hesitate about persisting in his opposition to the Home for Destitute Colored Women and Children? It is true he did not withdraw his formal opposition to that appropriation, but I presume that he felt that for the sake of consistency he must insist upon his motion to strike out that specific item.

I have been asked by one or two gentlemen as to the constitutionality of these appropriations. There was an evident confusion in the mind of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] when he said that we had not any right to appropriate public funds for what he denominated private purposes. He was evidently thinking, Mr. Chairman, of the law of eminent domain, and of the general theory of the law of taxation—the law of eminent domain which provides that private property can only be taken for public use or a public purpose; the general theory of taxation, which is that the sovereign power of government, that is, the sovereign power of taxation, or its incipient stage, the loaning of money or credit, should never be exercised except for a public purpose.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should not ask this indulgence if I were not on the subcommittee which framed this bill, and therefore I desire to make a few additional remarks.

It is true that the general theory of taxation is that the public moneys can not be taken for a private use. The question always arises, then, whether the legislative power of taxation has been properly exercised, every presumption being in favor of the validity of the assumed prerogative, and it only being decided by the court when appealed to that the exercise is improper when the case is clearly made out. So it has been held that the public funds can not be loaned, that the power of taxation can not be exercised in favor of private manufacturing corporations or in favor of the construction of a railroad, like that of the Niagara Whirlpool Company, where the design was rather the amusement of travelers and pleasure-seekers—that is, to give them a better opportunity to visit the falls—than the ordinary purposes of a railroad.

But I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that from day to day and from week to week in this House we appropriate the public funds, without the slightest hesitation, for purposes which are purely private; and I notice the gentleman from Nebraska has introduced bills which clearly provide for the appropriation of public moneys for private purposes. There are, as I have said, certain exceptions to the general theory of taxation. What are they? The most striking exception is the law as to the granting of pensions; and in reference to that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the general power of giving or withholding pensions is vested in the Congress of the United States, and that a pension is in reality a bounty or gratuity. We also exercise the power in reference to certain claims, not legal in their nature, against the Government.

It was only yesterday that we received a message from the President of the United States asking that an appropriation be made for the families of laborers who were ruthlessly slain in Colorado. That was not strictly a public purpose; that was not strictly a public use; and it is only by virtue of our general moral and equitable jurisdiction that we make appropriations for the payment of such claims. But on this specific question of charities and charitable purposes let me call your attention to the fact that we are sitting as the legislative body of this District; that as to this District we are simply the common council; that we do not propose in the disposition of this charitable fund to legislate on any of the topics committed to us under the general scheme of Federal legislation. We are merely in the place of a local body, of a local legislature, or of the common council of a municipality, which under the laws of the State of New York, as under the laws of many of the States of this Union, legislates for the State, or for a municipality, and which has the right to parcel out and apportion the general charitable fund intrusted to its care and control.

I do not take this position blindly, but in support of it I cite the greatest authority on the question of taxation in the United States, and that is Judge Thomas M. Cooley. He tells us that a man would be bold indeed who in these days, at this stage of the history of the country, should question the public right to make provision for these benevolent objects. He goes further and lays down the principle, as a matter of law, that public charity, even when the delegation of the power of distribution is given to a private corporation, is a public purpose; that the maintenance and support of these charities through private individuals or private corporations is a public purpose; and he says that by the common consent of all civilized countries it has always been so held.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us have a vote.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that I know of my personal knowledge that this institution is one which needs money as much and possibly more than any other in this city. At St. Ann's the average daily number of inmates is 130. Children of all nations and creeds, white and colored, are admitted and cared for. The expense per capita for the support of the inmates was $8 per month, except for the infants who are boarded out, this being necessary in many cases in order to preserve the lives of very young infants. The asylum has no revenue except the bequests of charitable benefactors, and on account of the utter helplessness of the orphans the expenses are very heavy, amounting to many thousands of dollars. There are no salaried officers, the only compensation paid out being to the servants absolutely necessary to assist in the work entailed by care of so many helpless infants. The sisters devote their whole time night and day to the care of the children, and have endeavored, by sewing and by personal appeals to the charitable in addition to the appropriations hitherto made by Congress, to enlarge the asylum and properly care for its numerous inmates.

I desire to call special attention to the fact that no discrimination is shown on account of nationality, creed, or color, but all are cared for in the broad spirit of Christian charity, whose only limit is the want of greater facilities. I will not detain the House further than to call attention to page 191 of the report which informs us that the rights, duties, and privileges of St. Ann's Asylum were provided by an act of Congress, approved by President Lincoln; and I ask can any Republican in this House strike down an institution which owes its creation to the hand of Abraham Lincoln?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. One word Mr. Chairman. St. Ann's Infant Asylum was incorporated in 1863, like the institution in the item which precedes it in the bill, and its charter, like the charter of the other, was signed by President Lincoln—if that makes any difference. It cares for children until they are 7 years of age; they can not stay there after that time. It receives both white and colored children, Christian, pagan, German, Irish, American, Jew, without distinction. All that is required to entitle them to admission is that they shall be needy and helpless. Now, under these conditions, and in view of this state of facts, I think this appropriation ought to be made. It is not a sectarian appropriation. I have already put into the RECORD the proof of that. It is a mere employment of this institution to care for these 130 children, black and white, Protestant, Catholic, or what not, because the District of Columbia has no place of its own in which to care for them, and until we provide a suitable place it seems clear that we ought not to turn these children out. That is the substance of this proposition. But my friend from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] says that this appropriation is sectarian, and my friend from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] also says it is sectarian. They agree about that, but one of them wants to make the appropriation because it is sectarian and the other wants not to make it because it is sectarian.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I assumed, for the purposes of the argument, but I did not say, that it was sectarian.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I say it is not; and I am glad that the gentleman makes this correction, because when he was talking I felt that this worthy measure, the best measure that we can adopt for the care of these children in the absence of a suitable institution of our own, was likely to be sacrificed, like Christ, between two parties that did not otherwise agree. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Are there any officers, attendants, or other persons connected with St. Ann's Infant Asylum, except the infants, who are not Catholics?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do.

Mr. CANNON. And for the purposes of this appropriation I do not care. There are 130 children there for whom we have no place, wards of this District, and until we get a place of our own to shelter them I am willing to hire these institutions to care for them for the coming fiscal year rather than turn them out into the streets.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That is all right; but I simply wished to show that the institution is sectarian.

Mr. CANNON. I am not speaking about the institution. I am speaking about this appropriation, which can only be expended under the eye of a Government officer, which can be expended for this purpose and for this purpose alone, and which must be accounted for.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois is certainly a very remarkable one. We have a right to expect a reasonable degree of candor in the discussion of facts. Now, I wish to call attention to page 190 of the report of the institution for 1895. This is the report made by the sister who is president of this institution, under date of July 23, 1895, to the superintendent of charities. I read:

Col. JOHN TRACEY,
Superintendent of Charities.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your communication of the 3d ultimo, I respectfully submit the following report of St. Ann's Infant Asylum for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, which is now and has been for a quarter of a century under the charge of the Sisters of Charity of the Order of St. Vincent de Paul——

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Now, I ask the gentleman if that is not a Catholic institution?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. And is not the Catholic Church a sect?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The case is made out, then.

Mr. CANNON. Go on, now, to your next question.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman from Illinois says that he knows of no reason why we should not employ these people to take care of these children. Neither do I. But that is not the question. The question is, shall we appropriate here a lump sum to enable those who control these institutions to carry on the business and take in whoever they desire? My proposition is that we ought to make the appropriation to the board of children's guardians, United States officials, who, if they desire, can place these children in this institution, where they can be taken care of; but the proposition of the pending bill is to appropriate a lump sum for these people and allow them to spend it as they choose. That is the question pure and simple, and it is not worth while, even for a man of the ability which I concede to the gentleman from Illinois, to any longer dodge the question.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, one word in reply. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will not reply, because I have explained the matter three times, and the gentleman from Nebraska will not hear or understand. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, speaking in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska, I congratulate him on the fact that the committee has at last come to a realization of the truth that the administration of these charities is not religious in its character, or private in its conception or consummation. I base this statement upon the vote which has just defeated the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska which was designed to keep out of this bill an appropriation for the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children.

Every man, Mr. Chairman, who voted in favor of the retention of this appropriation asserted by that vote his belief that whether this appropriation was private or otherwise, he was in favor of it. That being the case, how can such a man vote against the provisions in the subsequent paragraph, and how can he consistently and logically vote against the reconsideration of the vote which struck out the preceding paragraphs from this bill? Having kept in that proviso, having retained that paragraph for the maintenance of the Home for Destitute Colored Women and Children, how can my Republican brethren vote to strike out the provision which, according to the statement of the venerated and honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, carries with it an appropriation for colored children—I emphasize the words, colored children? And, Mr. Chairman, those children, it appears by the statement, are under 7 years of age.

Now, according to the precepts of the church to which I belong, no child under 7 years of age is recognized as other than a noncommunicant, and according to the precepts of the logicians from Aristotle down to that erratic individual, Jeremy Bentham, no individual is recognizable as a creature amenable to the laws of morals or society or religion or human law who has not the use of reason, and before a child attains the age of 7 years he certainly is not susceptible to the precepts and inculcations of religion. That being the case, the institution now under consideration is certainly not a religious association, and, as my friend from Illinois has said, both races being accepted within the precincts or realm of that institution, there is no color discrimination. Consequently I can not see how my friends on the other side can make political capital by voting against or for these colored people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, proceeding from the assertion of these propositions, which I think are irrefragable——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] be allowed to proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, going back thirty or thirty-five years, a war was waged for the dissolution of this Union. Soldiers innumerable on both sides of Mason and Dixon's line flocked to the standards of what they considered right. The reverberations of cannon echoed down the valleys of Virginia. Swords and muskets asserted their supremacy. Brother fought against brother; soldier on one side against soldier on the other. As the soldiers went down on the side of the Union, there came upon the battlefields the white-winged messengers of peace, robed in the raiments of mercy and charity, and many a parched tongue and parched throat accepted the ministrations of those pure, beautiful creatures, who, protected by soldiers and officers, as well as by the President of the United States, the great, grand, and lamented Lincoln, came and ministered to them. Was there any question then on the part of the gentleman from Nebraska as to granting those emissaries of mercy a commission to fulfill their errand to those soldiers? Did he then, or did those whom he now represents, rise in their might and protest against the charitable work of those angelic forms in human shape? No, Mr. Chairman, not one word of protest was uttered then. Yet the representatives of the descendants of the men who were assisted by those lovely women come here to-day and protest in the name of what? Infidelity against religion.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this committee has put on record its vote in favor of the appropriation for the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children (for which I voted); in view of the fact that that is an assertion on our part that the institution is not private in its character and is nonsectarian, although, according to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations it is in no wise different from the one now before us for consideration, I fail to see how our Republican brethren can vote against the appropriation.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, the opposition to these appropriations is urged upon the basis of two principles, both of which I recognize as correct in the abstract. The first is that this Government, having no alliance with religion or sectarianism in any form, ought not to appropriate public money for the establishment of religion, for the teaching of religion, or for the promotion of religion or sectarianism. That is right. The other principle is that public functions should be performed through public agencies, and should not be devolved upon private institutions or individuals, and that, therefore, public money should not be donated to private individuals or institutions upon the pretext that they are performing public functions.

Those principles are right in the abstract, and we should seek with all reasonable diligence to give them practical effect. But it is sought here to suddenly apply them to conditions in which a great wrong would result from their immediate application. There is no need of making a juggernaut of progress. There is no need of crushing out the lives of public charges who are now being cared for in private, even in religious, asylums and hospitals merely because we have determined that hereafter such charges must be cared for in public institutions. Confessedly we have no such public institutions now, and we are therefore unprepared to immediately change our system of caring for the poor and the sick and the wayward.

We have for more than a century gone on intrusting the care of the sick and the destitute to private institutions. The helplessness of these fellow-beings, white and black, their poverty, their inability to care for themselves, appeal to us in the name of humanity, and in the name of our civilization, of which this nation ought to be the highest type and leader. They demand at our hands not religious instruction, but food, clothing, and shelter. They should, as brethren, be provided with these things through public institutions, if we have them. If we have not such institutions our duty to these unfortunates is not thereby changed, and that duty must be performed through such private instrumentalities as may be at hand and as shall seem best for the time being.

In the absence of such public institutions the means that are proposed in this bill to be continued for at least another year seem to be the best available, and in spite of the fact that we should make proper provision for adhering to both of the principles asserted on the other side these appropriations, and all of them, should now be made. These principles can be best and most humanely asserted by making provision for the proper care of all public charges in the future in institutions that are both public and nonsectarian.

Indeed, I am inclined to agree with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that these appropriations are not sectarian. These appropriations are not made for the purpose of promoting any religion or sect. They are made for the purpose of procuring food, clothing, and shelter for the helpless and destitute, whose misfortunes make them, in some sense, wards of the nation. How is it ascertained that any of these appropriations has the color of sectarianism? In order to find it you must look beyond the purpose for which the institutions are employed—beyond the purpose for which the appropriations are made—and you inquire what, if any, religious belief these people or these institutions have or hold. The answer coming that they belong to or uphold some particular religious creed or doctrine, you say: Then they should not be hired to give food and shelter and clothing to these wards of the nation, because, whenever it appears that they profess some religious creed, their employment becomes a devotion of the public money to sectarian purposes.

But the institutions named in the bill are private institutions, and they come within the other objection, provided we are in a position otherwise to do our duty to the public charges now cared for in such institutions. Confessedly we are not in that position.

Now, sir, the Constitution of the United States forbids Congress to establish religion—commands that it "shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." Let me suggest to my friends who are so eager to divorce church and state—and none favor it more strongly than I—where a first step should be taken in putting this provision of the Constitution into operation——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I would like to have a few minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAGUIRE. There is an establishment of religion right here in this House, and repeated appropriations of public money for the establishment and promotion of religion here, which, in my judgment, we ought to stop before we take up the subject of charitable appropriations to sectarian hospitals and asylums. The election of a Chaplain of this House is an act respecting an establishment of religion. You can not select a Chaplain to pray for heavenly guidance for this House without having first determined that he is a minister of the true religion. How worse than useless, nay, how terrible it would be to select a minister of a false religion to serve as a medium of communication between this House and the Almighty. His appointment would be an insult to Divinity, and his prayers would be blasphemies, bringing curses instead of blessings. We do necessarily establish a religion in the election of a Chaplain to conduct religious services for the House, and we do it in defiance of the constitutional provision which absolutely forbids it. We have no right to do it, and no right to appropriate a dollar of public money for that purpose.

Now, let those who object to sectarianism in our laws and in our appropriation bills—in which I quite agree with them in principle—do away with this unconstitutional establishment of religion and put a stop to this unconstitutional appropriation of public funds to pay for sectarian teaching and sectarian religious ceremonies. I will go as far as any of these gentlemen in supporting the spirit of our institutions as embodied in that provision of the Federal Constitution; but let us commence where no harm and no wrong can be done. If principle be the sole motive of the objections to these appropriations, and I assume that it is, here is a grand and conspicuous field for patriotic effort. Let our national church establishment be disestablished and leave these minor violations of principle until the Government is better prepared to substitute public care for private care of its charges.

I make these suggestions in no spirit of hostility to the churches nor to any church. I recognize their great power for good among men. I believe they will be stronger and greater when they shall be entirely separated from the state, and I believe that the state will be likewise made stronger and better and purer by such separation.

This is a civil government, deriving nothing from the church and capable of giving nothing to it. It should be strictly nonsectarian—professing no religion, but respecting and equally protecting all.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the gentlemen who have debated this question for nearly two days past have been confusing the legal aspects of it, or placing them upon a false basis.

It has been said repeatedly by gentlemen, during the discussion, who oppose the appropriation that the provision in the bill was objectionable in that it appropriated public money for private use, and secondly, that it appropriated money for sectarian purposes. Now, sir, I think that this proposition is entirely fallacious. The true reason why this appropriation is objectionable has not yet been touched upon in my judgment. It is quite true, as a general proposition, that public money should not be appropriated for a private use; but that question is not involved in this discussion. Gentlemen fail to distinguish clearly between the character of the object to which the money is appropriated and the instrumentality that shall administer that fund. An appropriation of public money for purposes of charity, for the care of the poor and destitute, is an appropriation of money for a public use and not an appropriation for a private one, and has always been so held by lawmakers and lawgivers.

Now, the appropriation of money for this German Lutheran Orphan Asylum and for the Catholic institution in this city is not an appropriation of money for private use simply because it is to be administered by a certain class of officials. The character of the appropriation depends altogether upon the use to which the money is to be put, and not at all upon the character of the instrumentality that shall have the right to administer it. An analogous case, and one which is familiar to every lawyer, is the case of a grant of public aid for the construction of a railroad. A railroad company is a private corporation; but the use to which it is to be put is a public one. Notwithstanding that distinction legislators throughout the entire world have been appropriating money in aid of building railroads on the ground, and it is so justified by the courts, that the expenditure of money for the building of the railroad is the expenditure of the money for a public use, even though the money is to be handled and administered and disposed of by a private corporation. So it is here. The appropriation of money, therefore, for a charitable object, as in this case—that is, to maintain the poor—is an appropriation public in its character nothwithstanding the fact that it is to be administered wholly by a private association.

Now, I think the true ground for objection to this appropriation should not be placed here. Gentlemen are failing to distinguish between the quality of the use and the character of the instrumentality. My objection to it is this, that it is an appropriation by the people of the United States to do a charitable work, to take care of the poor, in another municipality; that is to say, in the District of Columbia.

We have in our several States to take care of our own poor. Why should not the people of this District take care of theirs? We have in our own States to administer to our own charities. Why should not the people of the District of Columbia administer theirs and pay for them, as we have to at home? We are taking money out of the people of all of the States in order to help the people in the District of Columbia take care of their own poor and administer their own charities, which is an act of injustice to your people and mine at home, who have work enough of that kind on their hands already.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if it were permissable, I should move an amendment that this expenditure of money shall be chargeable wholly to the revenues of this District.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POWERS. I should like a little more time.

Mr. GROUT. I ask that the gentleman have what time he desires.

By unanimous consent, the time of Mr. POWERS was extended five minutes.

Mr. POWERS. The objection to the amendment of my friend from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] is that he saves no money to the Government. He proposes, when we reach the amendment he offered on yesterday, to make this same appropriation of money for this same purpose, but to have it administered, not by these particular church organizations, but by a public organization, so that we come to the same evil result in the end. We are appropriating the money of the people of the United States to help the people of the District of Columbia take care of their own charitable institutions.

It is all wrong, Mr. Chairman. The Government of the United States to-day is paying half the ordinary expenses of the local government of this District. The taxes that are imposed upon the people of this District are not half as great as the taxes imposed upon my people at home; and still they are asking us here, in addition to all that, to help them carry on such charitable organizations and carry out such charitable objects and purposes as the ingenuity of their leading men may prescribe. It is all wrong, sir. The objection to this proposal is that it is being paid for by the wrong class of people, and if an amendment would be in order to make this expenditure chargeable solely to the revenues of this District, so that the District of Columbia would pay their own bills for such purposes as your people and mine have to pay, then I should be heartily in favor of it.

Now, upon the other branch of the proposition, it is said that it is an expenditure of money for a sectarian purpose; and I was somewhat amused to hear the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], in defense of the appropriation for the German orphanage, insist that that institution was not sectarian. Why? He says these other schemes are sectarian, because the pastor of one single church heads the administration of the trust, but that his is not sectarian because two ministers head that, as if that alters the character of the appropriation in the least.

All of them, Mr. Chairman, are organizations fostered and encouraged by particular sectarian churches. They are under their control just as much as a ladies' aid society of the Congregational Church is under its control, or a ladies' aid society of some other church is under its control. They are all specifically and definitely sectarian in their management. It is true that all of them will come before Congress and maintain that they are not sectarian, because they say, "We will take the children of all denominations; we will take the child of the Catholic, the child of the Presbyterian, the child of the Methodist, the child of the Hebrew. We will take them all in."

They will say that when they are asking for money, but when they get the money they will administer it for their own private purposes. In that sense they are sectarian.

Now, I would not appropriate a cent of public money to foster and encourage the funds or the work of any church on earth. I do not care whether it is Catholic or Protestant, I would do it as quickly for a Catholic as for a Protestant, but the principle is wrong. It is an appropriation of the people's money for a purpose for which the Government was never organized.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I will occupy the time of the committee but a moment. I shall not stop to answer the argument of the gentleman last upon the floor [Mr. POWERS] as to the propriety of saddling this whole cost upon the people of the District of Columbia. I would say that such a motion here would be out of order, but if the gentleman is sincere in his belief that this relation, which the people of the whole country sustain to the people of the District, does not justify the present system, then let him bring in a bill to reform the present system and we will discuss that question when it comes up.

I want to say that I am a little astonished at the statement of my friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], that this institution is not sectarian, and that this is not a sectarian appropriation. It was quite fully explained by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] that it is in charge of the Sisters of Charity of the Order of St. Vincent de Paul.

I find from the report on the page following that read from by the gentleman from Nebraska that St. Ann's Infant Asylum keep these children until they are 7 years of age, and then I find, when we turn to St. Rose Industrial School, that the girls at 14 come from the Order of St. Vincent to the St. Rose Industrial School, an institution to which you will have your attention called in a moment, and that they there remain until their education is completed.

Now, you have here the course of a complete educational system for the support of two links, of which, viz, St. Ann's and the St. Rose School, there are appropriations asked from this Congress. The Order of St. Vincent does not apply for aid.

It seems to be the intermediate link in this chain of instruction, and the whole business seems to be under the order of St. Vincent de Paul.

But it is perfectly clear that if these appropriations be made for these two institutions, that the public money will be used for the beginning and the rounding out of the physical, moral, and religious training of these young ladies up to the time when they are ready to go forth in the battle of life, or themselves become Sisters of Charity. If this would not be the use of money for sectarian educational purposes I do not know what would be.

As to the appeal of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to the sympathies of members, lest, if this appropriation should fail, these children would be uncared for, let me say, borrow no trouble.

There are already in the District of Columbia many institutions of a similar character not asking aid. St. Ann's Infant Asylum will go on with its work just the same though this appropriation should be withheld. If you will turn to page 47 of the report of the superintendent of charities you will find a list of all the charitable institutions of the city—51 in all—and you will find in that list 32 in number which are not asking for Congressional aid, and, I presume, all doing good work. Had I the time I would read the list. It is full of instruction. Of these institutions that are asking aid, 19 in all, 6 of which are clearly, as has been already shown, strictly sectarian, these institutions, every one of them, would continue their work, though possibly on a more limited scale.

Mr. HERMANN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him if it is not a fact that within the last few years there has been a very great augmentation so far as our beneficiary acts are concerned as to these objects, and if this Congress should now continue to encourage it will not there be an additional increase in the future?

Mr. GROUT. That is the fact; and if you will recall what I stated on the floor yesterday you will have in mind the augmentation of it as shown in this bill. There are four new charities put in here which, by the way, are meritorious and to which I make no objection. Now, I am willing, and indeed, Mr. Chairman, I think it good policy, provided that an amendment be adopted such as was read yesterday in the body of my remarks, bringing these institutions under public supervision, to appropriate for them. I believe we are not going amiss in appropriating for them where they are unsectarian. I believe that if the $70,000 or $80,000 that goes for this purpose to-day, to help out the charitable and philanthropic purposes of the people of the District through the medium of these charities, were withdrawn, and the Government were to take entire charge of these needy classes, it would cost not $70,000 or $80,000, but $700,000 or $800,000, but the other is a different question.

Mr. Chairman, we are brought face to face with the proposition to appropriate the public money for the use of these private sectarian institutions where complete intellectual, moral, and religious training of the inmates is all the time in sectarian hands, and I must draw the line here. I do not care whether the institution be Catholic or Protestant. The same principle applies. We applied it yesterday to a Protestant school, and let us without flinching apply it to-day to this Catholic school, and then to the next item but one. There is, in fact, no other safe course for the American people.

If free government is to be preserved to the future dwellers of this continent, and at the same time free religion is to make bright their hopes of a life beyond, that government and that religion must be kept absolutely separate. The moment you join the two that moment the freedom of both is gone. From that very moment each will strive to tyrannize over the other—the church over the state and the state over the church, and both together will be sure to tyrannize over man.

The religious sentiment is strongest of any in the human breast. The affections perhaps come next; but never have we heard of but one war on account of love, the one in which figured Helen and Priam and ancient Troy. But the page of history is red with the blood of religious wars. Let us, then, in administering the affairs of state, let religion entirely alone; and let us at the same time insist that religion shall not meddle with the state. Let us hold inviolate all public funds for public use only, including public schools. This, faithfully and resolutely done at all times and on all occasions, may save us from the burning question as to the rights of parochial schools, which to-day agitates our neighbor on the north, and over which a whole province is well-nigh in revolt.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment was read, as follows:

For St. Ann's Infant Asylum, maintenance, $5,400.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the merits of the proposition advanced here that public money should not be appropriated for sectarian purposes, and however fully the principle may be conceded by all of us that there should be a complete separation of church and state, I can not see how either one of these principles apply to a proposition to appropriate money in aid of an orphan asylum in the District of Columbia.

The Congress of the United States is, so far as the District is concerned, the State legislature and the town council. Its authority is supreme, subject to no limitations whatever, and being under the same responsibility that ordinary municipal and State governments are to take care of the orphan, the helpless, the dependent, it has the right to utilize any instrumentalities that it sees fit to carry its charitable purposes into effect. I can not understand how anyone can contend that the appropriation of money for the support of orphans is the appropriation of money for a private purpose. Neither can I understand how the appropriation of money in support of a charitable institution, which may be taken care of by one religious association or another, can be held to be an appropriation for sectarian purposes.

If associations organized for the purpose are not to take care of these orphans and other dependents, who is to take care of them? Who are so well able to disburse wisely the money which is given for this purpose in support of helpless orphans as those who have devoted their lives to the work? Further, Mr. Chairman, I am told that in this particular case the institution is under the control of officers who are bonded, who render regular accounts of their expenditures, and who are practically, therefore, under the supervision and control of the public officials of the District, if such control is necessary.

In this connection I wish to call attention to an incident which came under my personal observation a few years ago. We have there what I believe to be the noblest institution of its kind in the United States, the Charity Hospital, in which the wounded and the sick and the distressed of all nationalities can find refuge and succor, where they receive medicine and clothing and support free of any charge whatever. I was once invited to go through that institution with one of its officers and found that the same class of people who are in control of the institution now under consideration, the Sisters of Charity, were taking care of that great hospital—that is to say, they were doing all the work which was necessary to carry the charitable purposes of the institution into effect.

It is true they were acting under the supervision of State officers, but they were the instrumentalities by which that great charity was doing its beneficent work. So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me to be coming down to a very low plane to refuse an appropriation to this orphan asylum, an institution erected and maintained for the care of children under the age of 7, on the ground that the appropriation is for sectarian or private purposes. In my judgment it is for neither the one nor the other.

Mr. GROUT. Let us have a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The question being taken on the amendment, the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 93, noes 25; so the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Association for Works of Mercy, maintenance, $1,800.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. I hope we shall have a vote.

The question being taken, the Chairman declared that the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 100, noes 28; so the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the House of the Good Shepherd, maintenance, $2,700.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move to strike out the paragraph.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, this House of the Good Shepherd——

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Alabama proceeds, I ask consent that all debate upon this paragraph and amendments be limited to ten minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, the House of the Good Shepherd was established in this District by the daughter of an eminent naval officer. She gave her entire fortune and the efforts of her life to build up the institution. It has had a few donations, and now it is almost entirely supported by the efforts of the Sisters and the beneficiaries, who endeavor by their labor in taking in plain sewing and other work to, so far as possible, defray the expenses and take care of the poor people under their charge. The report shows last year they earned $2,366.15 in this manner, almost as much as was appropriated by Congress.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Does the gentleman say that there are any children kept in this institution?

Mr. WHEELER. I think there are some. The report speaks of work by children, and my information is that children of 14 years and upward are cared for there.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No, sir; it is for white adults, erring white women.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman is mistaken. Not only does the report of the sisters, page 229, speak of children, but also on page 42 they refer to some of their inmates as small children, showing that they must have children there under 14.

The gentlemen who have stated that this institution is sectarian are certainly ignorant of its organization. It is true that the Sisters of the Good Shepherd are Catholics, but one of the leading managers of this institution for many years was the very distinguished Presbyterian divine, the Rev. William Alvin Bartlett, so long the rector of New York Avenue Church. This most certainly classifies the House of the Good Shepherd as absolutely nonsectarian, and this fact deprives those who are striking at our charitable institutions of any excuse for voting against the appropriation for the House of the Good Shepherd.

Now, the gentleman from Vermont said in his speech that this Government never appropriates money for any purpose to be disbursed by other than Government officers. Sir, he himself voted in this Hall to appropriate $100,000,000 to be used in educating the illiterate in the various States of the Union; and that bill provided that the money should be apportioned by the Secretary of the Interior among the various States according to the number of illiterates and should be paid over to the officers of the respective States, who were not required to be bonded at all, and upon whom no other requirement was imposed than that a report should be made to the Federal Government as to the manner in which the money had been expended. In this case we do not go as far as that. We have these institutions under our eye, under our control; and we require by law that the officials of these institutions who expend the money should be bonded and return an official report showing just how the money is expended.

The House seems to have been misinformed upon this important point, and I find this wrong impression has influenced many members in their votes. I stated yesterday what the law was, and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON] read the law again this morning, which clearly states that the law absolutely prohibits the payment of any of this money except to an officer who is bonded, and also that full reports of expenditures are required.

The Committee on Appropriations know, and all who have taken pains to investigate these matters know, that the proposed appropriation for the House of the Good Shepherd is absolutely necessary for its maintenance.

As the gentleman who just took his seat well said, we stand here not as Congress; we stand here as the legislature of this District; we stand here as a commom council, and it is our bounden duty to do all that may be necessary to take care of the needy and unfortunate in this community, over which we have exclusive jurisdiction.

I was sorry to observe that the gentleman from Vermont seemed to argue and by his amendment yesterday to insist that no money should be given to any institution that teaches the religion of God Almighty. Sir, institutions of mercy must be under religious control; they must be under some religious denomination; and it makes no difference to me whether they are under one denomination or another. All I want is that they do as these institutions do; ask only if the unfortunates brought to them need their care; ask only, "Do these people come under the head of those whom Christ in His Sermon on the Mount told all Christians to care for?"

These institutions have their doors open, and seem to say, almost in the language of Christ:

Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. * * * Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

I ask Congress if they wish to close the doors of such asylums, controlled by people whose entire lives are devoted to obeying the admonition of Christ?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HAINER of Nebraska, it was agreed to, there being—ayes 95, noes 23.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the St. Rose Industrial School, maintenance, $4,500.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SORG. Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken on striking out these other items I wish to say there are many members of this Committee of the Whole who are entirely in the dark as to the nature of these various institutions; and as long as gentlemen have seen proper to make explanations in regard to other items which have been stricken out, many of us would be very glad to have some member of the Committee on Appropriations explain the nature of the particular institutions we are now voting upon. Otherwise we are obliged to vote blindly. I hope we may have some explanation either from the chairman of the committee or from the gentleman who makes this motion to strike out.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HAINER of Nebraska, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 88, noes 15.

The Clerk read as follows:

For St. Joseph's Asylum, maintenance, $1,800.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Young Women's Christian Home, $1,000.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph just read, and I desire to offer a word of explanation, if I may be permitted.

We have reached now the conclusion of these several sectarian institutions. There remain only to be considered the item for the Young Women's Christian Home (an institution, I will say, for young women seeking employment while temporarily in the city); the Industrial Home School, which is located on Government property and which it was proposed in 1894 to make public, but which has not yet been made public—this is not sectarian; the Hope and Help Mission——

Mr. CRAIN. That is private.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. These are all private institutions. The Hope and Help Mission is a nonsectarian mission for the relief of fallen women; the Newsboys and Children's Aid Society is of the character indicated by the title. It is of course nonsectarian, as is the Eastern Dispensary, a hospital, as well as the Washington Home for Incurables, provision for which is made at the top of page 40. I shall move to strike out each of these items simply for the reason——

Mr. CRAIN. I object. I make the point of order that the gentleman's motion is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska has moved to strike out the pending paragraph.

Mr. CRAIN. I understood his motion to go further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will please be in order.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have made explanation of what my purpose is so as to avoid any further discussion on my part with respect to these paragraphs. It is evident to my mind that the temper of the House is opposed to striking out any of these additional paragraphs, against which I will direct my motions. I desire simply to have a vote, that the record may be made. I now ask for a vote on the motion to strike out the pending paragraph.

Mr. CRAIN. I rise to a parliamentary question. I may have misunderstood the gentleman from Nebraska, but I believe he referred to these various paragraphs, going down to the Newsboys and Children's Aid Society, and said that it was nonsectarian, not private.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It is private.

Mr. CRAIN. Do you mean to jump from that point down to this?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Oh, no. I said when we reached the paragraph I would make the motion.

Mr. CRAIN. Because I have a point of order against the other.

Mr. GROUT. Let me appeal to the gentleman from Nebraska not to insist on the motion, but to withdraw it. I can not see what possible good it will do, according to his own statement.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Well, let us have a vote on it.

Mr. GROUT. Very well, then, let us vote it down.

The question was taken; and the motion to strike out was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Industrial Home School: For maintenance, including repairs, $9,900.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that paragraph.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRAIN), there were—ayes 24, noes 69.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "dollars," in line 4 on page 39, the following:

"For the support and medical treatment of medical and surgical patients who are destitute in the city of Washington, under a contract to be made with the Providence Hospital by the Surgeon-General of the Army, $15,000.

"For Garfield Memorial Hospital—for maintenance to enable it to provide medical and surgical treatment to persons unable to pay therefor, $15,000."

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I raise the point of order. This amendment changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York on the question of order.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I understand that it is virtually conceded, with reference to all amendments of this character, that there is no provision of existing law for them.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the gentleman from New York will permit me at this stage, I will say that it is almost in the identical language of the appropriations made for years and years past, but which is ordinarily placed in the sundry civil appropriation bill; and I wish to make some remarks in reference to the propriety of the change which this amendment contemplates.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. And I make the further point of order that it increases the appropriation, and is therefore out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. That point of order is not well taken. There is nothing in the rule to prevent such an amendment.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, these two institutions, the Providence Hospital and the Garfield Hospital, have been in existence a number of years, and Providence Hospital is the older of the two. They have been annually appropriated for for a great many years past, and the only object of this amendment is to change them from the sundry civil appropriation bill to the District of Columbia bill; and the special object in that change is this: As they are now appropriated for, the Government of the United States pays the entire amount. If appropriated for in the District of Columbia appropriation bill the District will pay one-half of the amount, which, it seems to me, is entirely proper and appropriate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to ask if the amendment of the gentleman does not limit patients who may be received to persons who enter from the city of Washington? Should it not read the District of Columbia?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. There is no limit in regard to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the amendment limits it to the city of Washington entirely; at least I so understood the reading of it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No, sir; it is just as broad as the others contained in the bill, which provide for the District of Columbia.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I misunderstood the amendment as it was read to the House. It seemed to me that it limited the patients and persons who might enter the hospital to patients from the city of Washington.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That is not the intention and is not the language of the amendment, and I wish to call the attention of the committee and the Committee on Appropriations to this proposed change.

It is not an attempt to defeat an appropriation for either of these hospitals, or really to diminish the appropriation for either of them, although such is the fact in the present appropriation. The appropriation in the last Congress for each session was $19,000 for each hospital. I have cut it down to $15,000, as it seems to me that is sufficient for them. Again, in the appropriation for Providence Hospital I have found that it has been limited by making an appropriation for 95 medical or surgical patients at and for the gross sum of $19,000, which in itself does not permit any discretion upon the part of the Surgeon-General in regard to the amount that he shall pay. These are the reasons, Mr. Chairman, and now I should like a vote upon the proposition.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, one word in response. The gentleman by his argument has conceded that the existing law will be changed. Half of this fund, by the insertion of this provision in this bill, will be paid by the taxpayers of the District, and that is in itself a change of existing law, by taking it out of the other bill and putting it into this bill.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. There is no law on the subject to apply to the year ending June 30, 1897. It is simply in an appropriation bill, where it always has been for years and years. This simply changes it from the one appropriation bill to the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire if these are public institutions of charity, controlled in whole or in part by the District of Columbia?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. They are not. They are exactly in the same category as the appropriations which have already been made here for the Washington Homeopathic Hospital and for the other institutions which are appropriated for by this bill.

Mr. GROUT. And the fact, Mr. Chairman, that there is no law for the appropriation proposed to be made out of the joint fund of the District and the Government is the very reason why this is subject to the point of order. This amendment will change that liability. Now, these hospitals are sustained wholly by the General Government in another bill. If admitted to this bill, one-half of the expense is put upon the District, which can not be done except by new legislation, and this of course makes the amendment subject to the point of order.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, the whole object and intent of this amendment is to put these institutions exactly where kindred institutions are in the District of Columbia, and where they ought to be, namely, in the District of Columbia appropriation bill, where the revenues of the District of Columbia shall be chargeable with one-half of their expense. To do otherwise has been always inequitable, always improper, and always unjust, and I call the attention of the committee especially to this fact, that they are making fish of one and fowl of another, and all to the detriment of the Government of the United States.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, that is not the case——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAYNE). The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

In the opinion of the Chair it is no answer to a point of order that the amendment changes existing law to say there is at present no statute law upon the subject. In the absence of statute law there is still a rule established by custom. That is the law, and any proposition which enacts positive law is a change of existing law in that respect. The enactments of law where none now exists is a change of existing law. It is acknowledged by the mover of this amendment that it does enact positive law where none now exists, and in that it changes existing law, and the point of order is sustained.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Board of children's guardians: For the board of children's guardians, created under the act approved July 26, 1892, namely: For administrative expenses, including salary of agent, not to exceed $1,600, expenses in placing and visiting children, and all office and sundry expenses, $4,000.

For care of feeble-minded children; care of children under 3 years of age, white and colored; board and care of all children over 3 years of age, and for the temporary care of children pending investigation or while being transferred from place to place, $23,400; in all, $27,400.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move to amend by offering the amendment which has already been sent to the Clerk's desk, to strike out certain words beginning in line 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 39, in line 16, after the words "place to place," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert "$63,200; in all, $67,500: Provided, That the institutions for children, including industrial and reformatory, namely, the Church Orphanage of St. John's parish; the German Orphan Asylum; the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children, including its care of colored foundlings; the St. Ann's Infant Asylum; the St. Joseph Asylum, the House of the Good Shepherd; the Association for Works of Mercy, and St. Rose's Industrial School, heretofore receiving aid by specific appropriation, are hereby remitted, except as herein specifically appropriated for, to the appropriation herein made, and to the said act of July 26, 1892, to provide for the care of dependent children in the District of Columbia, and to create a board of children's guardians, for all rights and benefits which they may have under the provisions of the said act."

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I make a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CRAIN. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] will state his point of order.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Before the point of order is stated I wish to perfect the amendment. It was prepared before the vote was taken on the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children and on the Industrial Home School. The amount, therefore, is too large. I ask the Clerk to make the necessary subtraction, and to strike out the words "National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children and the Industrial Home School."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that modification will be made.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, the point of order I make is that the board of children's guardians have control, as all gentlemen have agreed in this debate, only of such children as have been assigned to them by the courts—none other. They have no control or right whatever with reference to the children of these other institutions named which have not been through the courts, and this amendment confers new power upon the board of children's guardians in the matter of disbursing this money. By authority of law they can not now pay out a penny of money except in behalf of those children that have been committed to them by the courts. I would like the gentleman to tell the Chair and the committee how this board can disburse for those charities (any of them) unless the children have been committed to the care of the board of children's guardians by the courts, and none of them confessedly have been, except such as the board already have charge of. It is very clearly a change of existing law, conferring upon the board power to pay out money for that which now they have no power to pay it out.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Nebraska allow me? I hold in my hand, if the gentleman has it not, the act creating the board of children's guardians.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have it.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to section 5, if he is not familiar with it. And I would like to have the attention of the Chair. I desire to ask the Chair if he has before him the act constituting the board of children's guardians?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will read from it, and then forward my copy to the Chair. Section 5 of the act that created this board of children's guardians referred to in the appropriation is as follows:

The board shall be the legal guardians of all children committed to it by the courts and shall have power to board them in private families, to board them in institutions willing to receive them, to bind them out or apprentice them, or to give them an adoption to foster parents, etc.

Under that clause this appropriation is in order and the amendment is in order.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is not well taken; neither is the objection urged by the gentleman from Illinois of any force.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I am with you; it is not an objection.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I understood the gentleman to base his objection on the amendment which I have offered——

Mr. CANNON. On the contrary, I say, having stricken out this appropriation, there is nothing left us but to avail ourselves of the board of children's guardians. It will not do complete justice, but partial, and is better than nothing.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I misunderstood the gentleman, and his presentation of the matter leaves me nothing to say.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I am astonished at the confidence displayed by my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in saying that section 5 of the act of 1892 makes it in order to put this amendment into the bill and to remit all these institutions to this board of children's guardians for their disbursements, as it is a confessed fact that the children therein have not been committed by the courts. It passes all human comprehension. Now, my friend from Illinois could have said so to the Chair. But I fear the trouble with my friend is that he is disappointed with the action of the committee with reference to some of these items in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, just at that point. He entirely mistakes me. We have stricken out the clause in the bill that provides for these classes of children which were not committed by the court. Now, then, this amendment——

Mr. GROUT. But the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CANNON. Well, substantially so, as to these sectarian institutions. Now, then, the board of children's guardians has the right, as to all children they have jurisdiction of, to board them in a private family or in any institution.

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, this appropriation should be increased to enable them to exercise that right; and while they can not board any children that they do not have any jurisdiction of, yet I presume that some of these children that they have not jurisdiction of they will get jurisdiction of through orders of the courts.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, every one of these institutions that have been stricken out as sectarian are named in this amendment and remitted to this board for their money; and confessedly in these institutions there is not a child that has been committed there by any court, and if there is it is an exception.

Mr. CANNON. But there are children that have been committed to them.

Mr. GROUT. Well, there may be some, but very few. The children are provided for in these institutions all over the city wherever the sisters and others looking for objects of charity can find them, wherever, in short, charity finds opportunity for expression. Now, I say that the board of children's guardians can pay no money out except to the class of children committed to it by the court, and to say that these institutions may be remitted, under this amendment, to them and they be entitled to pay money out to them, seems to me a perfect absurdity.

This amendment really puts these same institutions that we have stricken out back into the bill, and undertakes to pay them through the board of children's guardians; though I do not think the board could pay them, because it has no power under the law. The children in these institutions might, perhaps, be ground out through the courts and committed to the board of children's guardians and then the board could pay for taking care of them; but that is a condition that does not now exist. I do not say that it might not be arranged so that the board could pay for the care of these children, but then the very purpose of striking out these sectarian paragraphs would be defeated, because the St. Ann's Infant Asylum, the St. Rose's Industrial School, the St. Joseph's Asylum, the Church Orphanage Association of St. John's, the House of Mercy, and all these other institutions are included in this amendment, which undertakes to confer larger powers on the board of children's guardians. It does that, if it does anything.

Mr. HERMANN. I have voted all along with the gentleman in favor of separating these sectarian appropriations from the secular ones, and I want to continue in that course, but I wish to understand further what the relation of this board of guardians is to the General Government.

Mr. GROUT. They are a public board, appointed by the judges of the police court and of the criminal court, having certain powers conferred upon them by the act which has been read here, authorizing them to take charge of children that are committed to them by the courts, but of no others.

Mr. HERMANN. Then the gentleman's position is that all disbursements made through this board are substantially made through governmental agencies?

Mr. GROUT. That is so, and I am for the board of children's guardians as it stands in the bill. Every dollar estimated for was appropriated it; but here is a proposition to enlarge the powers of this board and to authorize them to employ these institutions that have been stricken out of the bill and to pay them out of the money which we appropriate here. Mr. Chairman, is not that an enlargement of the law creating this board? Most clearly it is. The power of the board is limited to taking care of children committed to them by the courts, but this amendment would permit them to disburse to other institutions the money which is appropriated here, thus contravening existing law.

Mr. HERMANN. Have not the board of guardians any discretionary power within themselves?

Mr. GROUT. None whatever, except to exercise their discretion in the care and management of children sent to them by the courts. When the court has committed a child to the board the board has power to take charge of that child, but not before.

Mr. CANNON. And that is the very object of this appropriation, to give this board money to provide for the children that are committed to them by the court during the coming fiscal year.

Mr. GROUT. Ah, but this would give them authority to pay these institutions which take care of children that are not committed by the court.

Mr. CANNON. Under existing law the board of children's guardians can not pay to an institution or anybody else any money out of these appropriations except for the support of children sent to them by the courts. They have a right to pay for the support of the children wherever they choose, in the exercise of a sound discretion, and I will say to my friend that of the children that have been committed to them for the present fiscal year they are placing a portion in private families in Pennsylvania, a portion in Maryland, and a portion in some of these institutions.

Mr. GROUT. That may be all true. They have authority now to do that, because those children have been committed to them by the courts; but if this amendment is adopted it will give them new powers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one point of order already pending.

Mr. CRAIN. Well, I have a new point. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will deal with one point of order at a time.

Mr. CRAIN. I rise to ask a question for information. Will the Chair please tell me what point of order was raised by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont raised the point of order that this was a change of existing law.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the Chair hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, but if the gentleman from Texas desires to debate the question further the Chair will hear him for ten minutes.

Mr. CRAIN. I do not exact it as a matter of courtesy, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman if he desires to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. CRAIN. I simply wish to fortify the argument of the gentleman from Vermont, and if the Chair does not desire to hear me I will ask that my argument may be printed in the RECORD, as I do not wish to inflict any remarks unnecessarily upon the committee or the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, the act of 1892, establishing the board of children's guardians, was amendatory of the act of 1885, and was followed by the act of 1895. The amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska is designed to put under the control of the board of children's guardians the various beneficiaries contemplated by the several paragraphs which, on his motion, have been stricken out, and which he now practically incorporates in his motion, notwithstanding the arguments of himself and gentlemen who have concurred with him. These beneficiaries include men, women, and children. Now, the act of February 13, 1885, declares as its object the care and maintenance of children under the provisions of the act providing for the prevention of cruelty to animals. I incorporate in my remarks the first section of that act:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the Association for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals for the District of Columbia shall be known as the "Washington Humane Society," and shall be authorized to extend its operations under this act to the protection of children as well as animals from cruelty and abuse. In pursuance thereof the said society may cause its proper officers or agents to prefer complaints before any court in the District of Columbia having jurisdiction for the violation of any law relating to or affecting the protection of children in said District, and by its proper attorney may aid in bringing the facts before such court in any proceeding taken.

Now, the gentleman from Nebraska, whose motives I do not question, has seen fit to argue in behalf of a distribution of this fund under the care of the officers originally appointed for the purpose of preventing cruelty to animals. Well, I admit that man is an animal.

Animal est id quod movet. An animal is that which is capable of moving. Consequently man is an animal. But he is a rational animal, and should not be placed in the same category with a brute. I want this Committee of the Whole to know what it is doing. Whether it is Republican or Democratic in sentiment, I do not think it ought to be asinine in its movements.

The act of February, 1885—

An act for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes—

declares, I repeat, that its object is to put children in the same category with dumb animals. The act of 1892 simply remits the appropriations to the act of 1885; the act of 1895 remits the appropriations to the act of 1892; and the proposition of the gentleman from Nebraska is simply a remission, or, if I may use the word, a remittitur, back to the act of 1892. Now, Mr. Chairman, every paragraph of the act to which the gentleman's proposition refers has for its object, with one or two exceptions, the care and maintenance of adults, not of children. Therefore the provisions of that act would not be applicable to the beneficiaries included in the several paragraphs of this bill. Consequently the gentleman's amendment, if adopted, would be nugatory, and therefore not one of these persons for whom we are undertaking to provide would receive any benefit. That being the case, in my judgment as a lawyer—a very modest and humble one I confess—the point of order of the gentleman from Vermont seems to me well taken. If the amendment should be adopted, the appropriation would simply lie in the Treasury and could not be utilized.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska proposes to remit the several institutions named in the bill, except those specifically appropriated for, to the general appropriation under this bill and to the act of July 26, 1892, to the terms of which act these several institutions must conform. This provision is a limitation upon the appropriations, but is in conformity with existing law—the law of July 26, 1892. Though the provision, if adopted, may result, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] argues, in cutting off certain institutions from the benefit of the appropriation, still it is a limitation which may properly be made in conformity with existing law. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order. The amendment is before the Committee of the Whole.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 89.

Mr. GROUT (before the negative vote was taken). Mr. Chairman, is it in order to say a word on the amendment now?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. GROUT. Well, I hope it will not be adopted. It will throw the whole bill into confusion.

The negative vote having been taken,

The CHAIRMAN announced the result—ayes 89, noes 11.

Mr. GROUT. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 12 voting in favor thereof.

So the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Hope and Help Mission, maintenance, $1,000.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move to amend by striking out this paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word on this question. I trust that the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska will not prevail. Let me read from the report of this Hope and Help Mission. After speaking of the many worthy and destitute women to whom the institution has given shelter and succor, the report continues:

We ask for larger appropriations. * * * As to the statistics, in addition to the large number of meals and lodgings already enumerated, of a temporal nature, we can testify that at least 14 women and girls have been clearly converted during the last six months, and the aggregate of the year is at least 25. A board which is nonsectarian is composed of Mr. James T. Petty and Mr. Thomas Jarvis of the Southern Methodist Church; Mrs. Mary E. Catlin, of the First Congregational Church; Mrs. L. D. Luckett, of the Metropolitan Presbyterian Church; Mrs. E. K. Knowles, of Vermont Avenue Christian Church; Mrs. M. M. Mitchell, of Waugh Methodist Episcopal Church, and Miss Mary Rector and Mrs. S. D. La Fétra of the Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church. All of these are actively engaged in systematic work in their own churches, and all testify to the statement that this work pays as good a percentage in practical results as any other work they do for humanity.

That is all I want to say. How much that differs from the items which we are speaking of and which were stricken out it is not for me to determine. They are doing good work. They have converted people and redeemed them from sinful lives.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. You concede that it is a private institution.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I have shown how it was organized. I do not think it ought to be stricken out, although every person connected with it, as is shown by the report, let me say, is doing active work in the various churches. But we have no other institution to take care of these fallen women but this and two other institutions which we have already stricken from the bill.

But I only wish to call the attention of the committee to it, and the committee can do as they will. I shall vote as I did in the other cases—vote against striking it out.

Mr. GROUT. I hope it will not be stricken out. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] says that it is a private institution. So it is. But we have retained other private institutions, with the understanding, I suppose, that when we are through with these different items an amendment will be offered, in substance that which I read in my remarks of yesterday, which provides that the appropriations shall not be made available until these institutions open their doors to public inspection by changing their articles of association, incorporation, or charter, as the case may be. When that is done, as I said once before this afternoon, there can be no objection to appropriating the money to these private institutions.

I also suggest that it will be economical to take care of the poor in that way, and the seventy or eighty thousand dollars which goes to these private institutions would, if the same number of beneficiaries were taken care of by the Government, cost probably seven or eight hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. CRAIN. Does the gentleman think that this is any more deserving than those which have been stricken out?

Mr. GROUT. Not probably on charitable grounds alone, but it is not a sectarian institution.

Mr. CANNON. What is it, then?

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman from Illinois asks what it is. It is a nonsectarian institution, because, on his own statement, the Christian women from the different churches in this city are interested in it and carry it forward. What I understand to be a sectarian institution, and what I think the gentleman ought to understand it to be, is an institution which is exclusively under the control of some one of the religious sects.

Mr. CANNON. Does it help it any—and I am in harmony with my friend——

Mr. GROUT. No; I am afraid you are not in harmony with me.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I am glad that the gentleman has come to my way of thinking.

But let me ask him, does it help it any for a half dozen churches to have charge of the institution instead of one? And let me ask him further, if this is not a religious institution, what is it? Will he say that it is not a religious institution when I read this:

We can testify that at least fourteen women and girls have been clearly converted and fully redeemed from leading sinful lives during the past six months.

And then, in connection with that, when I read the names of the different churches, the members of which constitute the corporation, does the gentleman not think that it is a religious institution under those circumstances?

Now, I am with the appropriation, but if it is not a religious institution, then what is it?

Mr. GROUT. Very well; I am glad the gentleman is through with his question at last. It is principally argument and but little question. He asked me a question and was not enough under control of himself to allow me to answer. I say there is this difference where several religious organizations are interested in these matters, because there they neutralize each other, and these girls that are converted—as the gentleman seems to have forgotten he read a second time—may have gone to the several churches.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the question of sectarianism, the managers of this institution—being some of them Presbyterians, some Episcopalians, and some Baptists, and yet all Protestants—in the distinction between Catholicism and Protestantism, are not sectarian.

Mr. GROUT. I do not understand that the word "Protestant" indicates a sect. I do not so understand at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GROUT. Not now. There is the Protestant Church—if I must discuss theological distinctions—and there is the Catholic Church. There are the Jesuits. There is the Order of St. Vincent de Paul that we have heard about to-day. There are more that could be enumerated if I had the time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Old Catholics and Roman Catholics.

Mr. GROUT. Old Catholics and Roman Catholics. The word "Protestant" does not indicate a sect. Under that general head come in many, many sects. That answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] is recognized.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not prevail. This Hope and Help Mission is doing a great and good work in this city in rescuing fallen women. I believe it is doing a great and good work for God and humanity. It is enabling some of these women to lead respectable and proper lives, and I am here to say, from personal knowledge, that it is an entirely unsectarian institution. It is supported by all the Protestant churches in this city, and I agree with the definition of the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] in regard to what constitutes sectarianism. Surely any institution supported by the different denominations of this country is not a sectarian institution. I hope the gentleman's amendment will not prevail, and that this appropriation for the Hope and Help Mission will remain in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GROUT. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 48.

Accordingly, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For Newsboys and Children's Aid Society, maintenance, $1,000.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move to strike out the paragraph just read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman—— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For Eastern Dispensary, maintenance, $1,000.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move to strike out the paragraph just read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, before that motion is put—— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Gentlemen, it is the wrong time to cry "Vote!" "Vote!" That ought to have been the cry long ago. I want to direct the attention of this committee to a few little inconsistencies about this matter.

Mr. GROUT. I hope the gentleman will have a chance to be heard.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, the gentleman is going to be heard.

There is not the slightest doubt about that. I wish to ask the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] why it was that he failed to move to strike out the words contained in lines 16 and 17 on page 36, the lines which make an appropriation for the Woman's Christian Association?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I do not recognize the right of the gentleman from Mississippi to catechise me. I simply did not choose to do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well, the gentleman declines to make an explanation.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I simply did not choose to do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to a most curious condition of things. Standing here as a Democrat, I felt a very unusual feeling yesterday when I saw a Republican rise to his feet and assert the good old Democratic principle that public money ought not to be devoted to private institutions. For a little while I thought that "a Daniel had come to judgment," and I felt that for once I was with him.

Then the gentleman from Nebraska was met by a snag in the very forefront of this bill, viz, the appropriation for the "Temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers and Sailors, Grand Army of the Republic," and before he got through he dropped his "great principle" that "public money should not be devoted to private purposes and to private institutions," and having a recollection of a Grand Army of the Republic vote behind him somewhere probably, he found it expedient to withdraw that motion from before this House; and then when the next clause struck him, for the "Woman's Christian Association, maintenance, $4,000," clearly a religious association, clearly a sectarian one, because no Jewess and no Catholic ever joins it, and can not join it consistently with their religious belief, he did not take a running start like he did on the other and stop before he jumped over, but he just jumped over it while nobody was watching and went on until he came down here to the little Episcopal Orphanage of St. John's.

Understand me, if there is a man in the world who believes in the principle that public money under no circumstances ought to be devoted to any purpose except a public purpose it is he who now addresses you. He goes on then and strikes that little orphan asylum. There are no votes behind that anywhere in the world. Consequently that is struck out by this Republican House. And then we go on a little further and we come to "Hope and Help Mission." I believe it is admitted that no Catholic or Jew aids in the management of that institution. And, again, lest there should be any possible mistake about my position in this matter, I desire to say that I am the farthest possible removed, religiously speaking, from a Roman Catholic. Then, when you struck that, although it is admitted that half of the Christian world, namely, the Roman Catholic part of the Christian world, has no part or parcel in it, and that therefore it is not omni Christian, but part Christian, sectarian Christian, this majority fails to agree with him.

Then you strike in another place in the bill the "wards of the nation," the colored citizens—and, by the way, I thought that phrase died about twenty years ago. There, again, this Republican majority finds out that it is running up against "practical politics," and the "wards of the nation" are left provided for, although that is an association not open to the entire people, but open only to colored citizens, and is therefore not a public institution. Now, my friends, you have made your own bed; you have received no hindrance from our own side; lie in it. There have been men making A. P. A. capital on your side, and all sorts of capital out of this bill. Just mark the situation into which you have thrown yourselves and see later if there is any "capital" in it.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The speech to which we have just listened illustrates the caliber of some gentlemen and measures high-water mark with them. There are some gentlemen who believe no person can take a position except it be with a view of securing the support of votes. That may be the measure of consistency and honor which prevails in the State of Mississippi. I deny the right of the gentleman to speak for anybody else except himself. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Now, he has asked the question why it was I did not make a motion to strike out certain paragraphs where I did not make the motion. The same question might be asked of him, why did he not make such a motion, if his answer were at all material and would be of the slightest importance or interest to this committee. It makes absolutely no difference. The question is, what is the right thing and practical thing to do about this matter? It was evident from the temper of the House from the very commencement that it would vote in favor of striking out all paragraphs which related to sectarian institutions, and it would not strike out any other.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. And therefore, as a person who has some idea of the practical side of things, I began my motions at the very first point where the sectarian question could be fairly raised.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I decline to yield. Now, my views on this matter are well known. My utterances on this subject are a matter of public record here, as they are at my home. I lived for over forty years before I ever asked the suffrages of anybody for an office, and I will perhaps live for forty years after going out of public service. That is a matter which concerns no one except myself and my constituency. I make my account to them and do not recognize the gentleman from Mississippi or any other individual in this House to call me to account for it. His remarks are without point, as he is a stranger to every question involved in this discussion.

Mr. MILES. The gentleman can not fix the period of his own longevity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I was not arraigning the gentleman from Nebraska individually. I was arraigning as a type. I was arraigning the action of the House. But I call the attention of the gentleman from Nebraska, since he has chosen to take it all on himself, to the fact that I have asked him a question which he has not yet answered; and that is, why was it that when he encountered the very first sectarian appropriation upon the bill he did not make the motion to strike it out? That is the item contained in lines 16 and 17, page 36, for "the Women's Christian Association, maintenance, $4,000." I challenge the RECORD to show that he did not make a motion in that case.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That is not a sectarian institution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Women's Christian Association?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No; it certainly is not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not! No Jewess could belong to it by its very terms, and certainly no Catholic could consistently belong to it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. THOMAS. Does the gentleman say that no Roman Catholic could join a Christian association?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are not in it.

Mr. THOMAS. Is it because they just choose to stay out?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is an "Evangelical Protestant" body, as I understand it, and a Jewess can not join it, nor a Roman Catholic consistently with her creed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I can answer that question. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union includes every Protestant denomination, and is entirely nonsectarian.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. GROUT, as follows:

Insert on page 40, after line 2, the following:

"That no part of any money appropriated by this act for charities or charitable institutions shall be paid to any institution named in this act until the charter or articles of incorporation thereof shall be so amended as to accord to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or to their designated agents, authority to visit and inspect such institutions, and to control and supervise the expenditure therein of all public funds paid out of appropriations made by Congress."

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment changes existing law.

Mr. GROUT. I do not think it is necessary to say anything on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. This is simply a limitation on the appropriation, and it has always been held that a mere limitation is always in order. It does not contravene any existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to have the gentleman from New York inform him what existing law this amendment would change.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I understand that there is no existing law giving this power of visitation.

The CHAIRMAN. But this amendment simply provides that "no part of any money appropriated by this act for charities or charitable institutions shall be paid to any institution named in this act until the charter or articles of incorporation thereof shall be so amended," and so on. It does not purport to amend any charter, but simply provides that the money here appropriated shall not be paid to any institution until its charter is amended as specified here. The amendment is simply a limitation upon the appropriation. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. LINTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 40, line 2, after the words "thousand dollars," insert: "Provided, however, That no money herein appropriated is to be used for the purpose of founding, maintaining, or aiding by appropriation, payment for services, expenses, or otherwise, any church, religious denomination, or religious society, or any institution, society, or undertaking which is wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report this bill——

The CHAIRMAN. One paragraph was reserved for consideration until the conclusion of the bill. The Clerk will report the amendment on which the point of order was reserved.

Mr. GROUT. I was about to ask unanimous consent to return to that paragraph if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] is ready to dispose of it now.

The pending amendment by Mr. DE ARMOND was read, as follows:

Amend by adding the following at the end of line 25, page 31: "To be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. Against this amendment the point of order was reserved that it changes existing law. The Clerk will read the paragraph to which the amendment applies.

The paragraph was read, as follows:

For interest and sinking fund on the funded debt, exclusive of water bonds, $1,213,947.97.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the amendment is that this sum shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia. The Chair has been cited to a number of laws regarded as relating to this matter. He has examined all of them carefully, and, in the opinion of the Chair, none of them are applicable to this question except what is contained in the law of 1878 and the law of 1879. The law of 1878 is the law which provides that the expenses of the District of Columbia shall be reported by the Commissioners to the Secretary of the Treasury, and his estimates shall be sent to Congress. Then follows this provision:

To the extent to which Congress shall approve of said estimates Congress shall appropriate the amount of 50 per cent thereof, and the remaining 50 per cent of such approved estimates shall be levied and assessed upon real and personal property in the District of Columbia other than the property of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

In this same act there is a reference to the expenses of the District of Columbia in these words:

Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, when the same shall become due and payable, and all amounts so paid shall be credited as a part of the appropriation for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the District of Columbia as hereinafter provided.

The Chair thinks that provision makes the interest due upon these bonds a charge against the appropriation which the United States makes toward the expenses of the District of Columbia, and it is to be credited upon the amount of that appropriation. Of course, if the appropriation is such that it shall equal the amount raised by taxes on property in the District of Columbia, it will result in the United States paying half of this interest and the District of Columbia the other half. But, however that may be, here is a positive enactment by statute that the interest shall be paid by the United States and credited by the United States upon the appropriation of one-half the expenses of the District of Columbia.

In the following year, the year 1879, a similar provision was made, which includes both the interest on the bonds and their principal. It is in these words:

And there is hereby appropriated out of the proportional sum which the United States may contribute toward the expenses of the District of Columbia in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 11, 1878—

The act from which I have just read—for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, such sums as will, with the interest thereon at the rate of 3.65 per cent per annum, be sufficient to pay the principal of the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia issued under the act of Congress approved June 30, 1874, at maturity.

In other words, it is provided that out of this appropriation made by the Government of the United States toward the expenses of the District of Columbia there shall be paid an amount equal to the interest on the bonds and also an amount which will provide for a sinking fund to pay their principal. The Chair is therefore of the opinion that the amendment would change existing law and is subject to the point of order. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we go back to page 38, line 10, and reconsider the vote striking out the German Orphan Asylum.

Objection was made.

Mr. GROUT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Before that motion is made, I wish to ask unanimous consent to recur to the paragraph on page 10 relating to "plats of subdivisions outside of Washington and Georgetown," to which I wish to offer an amendment which I will ask to have read, after which any gentleman who is unwilling to recur to the paragraph can object.

Mr. GROUT. Well, Mr. Chairman, I suppose I know what it is——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to have the amendment read. The gentleman is no doubt familiar with it; but I think the amendment is necessary. After it is read any gentleman who desires to do so can object.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the expenses of completing a map and of such surveys as may be necessary to enable the Commissioners of the District to determine whether plats of subdivisions of land within said District offered for record have been made in conformity to the "Act to regulate subdivision of land within the District of Columbia," approved August 27, 1888, $14,500.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, this proposition is so intermingled with a question which the committee has had under consideration and which refers to a matter in the estimates which the committee struck out, it is thought on hasty conference with members of the committee here that we can not consent to go back to the consideration of this proposition now.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is objected to.

Mr. GROUT. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House as amended.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Vermont so as to provide that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to strike out all paragraphs making appropriations to purely private charitable institutions and objects, and to insert a provision appropriating an amount equal to the sum of the appropriations stricken out to be expended under the direction of the board of children's guardians. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. I make the point of order that it is not competent for the Committee of the Whole to instruct the Committee on Appropriations. It is competent for the House to do so. When the bill gets into the House, even after the previous question is ordered, a motion to recommit will be in order. But I make the point that it is incompetent for the Committee of the Whole to adopt such a motion.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not see why the Committee of the Whole may not recommend that the House recommit this matter to the Committee on Appropriations. My motion does not propose that the Committee of the Whole recommit. It is a recommendation to the House that it recommit. Can there be any question about the competency of the House to recommit this bill? Can there be any question about the competency of this Committee of the Whole to make a recommendation to the House? It seems to me the point of order of the gentleman from Georgia is not well taken.

Mr. CANNON. I will suggest, if the Chair will permit me, one other point of order.

It seems to me that the resolution is broad enough, in the shape that it is now presented, to authorize legislation to be reported, in the event it is concurred in by the House, on the general appropriation bill. If so, it is not in order. You can not do anything by way of a motion to recommit that would impair the jurisdiction of a committee of the House. In a certain event I would have no objection to the Committee on Appropriations having the plenary power to originate legislation, but I suspect the District Committee would probably object.

Mr. HEPBURN. The objection of the gentleman seems to be that this resolution would authorize the Committee on Appropriations to do a forbidden thing. I have no doubt of the potency of the House and that that forbidden thing is so forbidden because of the rules. But has not the House power to change its own rules? This would be, for that purpose, simply a change in the rule; that is, if the gentleman's position is correct, and I am not at all sure that it is; but if correct, it is simply an objection because the House has no power to change its rules—a proposition that I deny.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the question. The Chair reads from the digest:

A recommendation reported from the Committee of the Whole which, if carried into effect, would change a rule of the House is not in order.

The Chair therefore sustains the point of order, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Vermont that the committee now rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. May I have a single word?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HEPBURN. The Chair has decided the proposition to be not in order, but has not indicated what rule of the House will be changed by it. The gentleman from Illinois only suggested that it might possibly authorize the committee to do something that might be construed as forbidden by the rules. Is not that a very violent presumption? Suppose the committee simply adopted the language of the resolution, declaring that the appropriation should be expended under the direction of the board of children's guardians—suppose that should be their action—what rule of the House is thereby violated? I would like to know, if any. What new legislation is in that, Mr. Chairman? Is that not now the law, as far as they have control of the appropriation? Certainly there is no violation of any law or rule that I know of.

What, then, would be a change of existing legislation? If it were a provision enlarging the powers of the board, stipulating what their duties should be, putting limitations on them, requiring bonds, for instance, to be given, that might possibly be a change of existing law. But if they did simply what the resolution requires them to do there would be no change of existing law or any violation of the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule again.

The resolution as drawn would authorize the board of children's guardians, if adopted, to expend all this fund as they please. It would enlarge their powers and would be a change of existing law without question in the mind of the Chair; and the point of order is sustained.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Vermont that the committee now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER accordingly resumed the chair; and Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the District of Columbia appropriation bill, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and, as so amended, that it do pass.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, a separate vote is desired on the amendment striking out the German Orphan Asylum, on page 38, and upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER].

The SPEAKER. A separate vote is asked on the two amendments which the gentleman has indicated.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the attention of the Committee on Appropriations for one single moment, as I wish to make a suggestion. Some of the amendments which have been adopted have provoked very much discussion, and it has been stated repeatedly by gentlemen in the discussion that the condition of the bill is illogical in its present form. I suggest, therefore, whether or not it would not be wise to let the bill be printed over night, with the previous question demanded, and let us see what there is in the bill at the present time.

I do not want to urge that, but only make the suggestion whether it would not be a wise precaution to take under the circumstances, and in view of the statements that have been made.

Mr. CANNON. Of course it is for the gentleman in charge of the bill to suggest such action as he sees proper.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We can not hear the gentleman from Illinois. We should like to hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. CANNON. If my opinion is of any account, I will say to the gentleman in charge of the bill, and in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], that we have had this bill under discussion now for two or three days. It is a printed bill, of which there are plenty of copies. Everybody can get possession of it and follow it. It does seem to me that we can and ought to pass this bill, with the amendments, before adjournment.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I will say it is stated to me by several gentlemen that they want to see this bill printed before they vote upon it.

Mr. CANNON (holding a copy of the bill in his hand). Here it is.

Mr. GROUT. I know, but gentlemen want to see these amendments. It is now almost 5 o'clock, and it seems to me the better way would be to adjourn until to-morrow morning.

Mr. CANNON. I will not antagonize the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. GROUT. Very well; in deference to the evident desire of the chairman of the Committee on Approprions, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WHEELER. I rise to answer your inquiry; to say what paragraphs we wish a yea-and-nay vote upon. We want a yea-and-nay vote upon the paragraph for the Church Orphan Asylum of St. John's——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order. The question is on the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendments, except those on which a separate vote was asked for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On what are separate votes asked?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments on which separate votes are demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, lines 10 and 11, strike out the following:
"For the German Orphan Asylum, maintenance, $1,800."

Also the following:

On page 39, in line 16, after the words "place to place," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert "$43,200; in all $47,200: Provided That the institutions for children, including industrial and reformatory, namely, the Church Orphanage of St. John's Parish; the German Orphan Asylum, including its care of colored foundlings; the St. Ann's Infant Asylum, the Association for Works of Mercy, the St. Joseph Asylum, the House of the Good Shepherd, and St. Rose's Industrial School, heretofore receiving aid by specific appropriation, are hereby remitted, except as herein specifically appropriated for, to the appropriation herein made, and to the said act of July 6, 1892, to provide for the care of dependent children in the District of Columbia, and to create a board of children's guardians, for all rights and benefits which they may have under the provisions of the said act."

Mr. WHEELER. I ask for a separate yea-and-nay vote upon lines 8 and 9, page 38, "for the Church Orphanage of St. John's Parish, maintenance, $1,800"; also upon lines 12, 13, and 14—no, Mr. Speaker, I do not ask for a separate vote upon that; but upon lines 15 and 16, "for St. Ann's Orphan Asylum, maintenance, $5,200"; also lines 19 and 20, "for the House of the Good Shepherd, maintenance, $2,700."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for a separate vote upon those propositions which he has named.

Mr. GROUT. Lines 12, 13, and 14 were not changed.

Mr. WHEELER. I withdrew that. I inadvertently mentioned the wrong lines.

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. MILNES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. In what state will the bill be left if we adjourn now?

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered, it will be the first thing in order, the Chair thinks.

Mr. CANNON. I hope we may have a vote, at least on the matters that are not in controversy.

Mr. MILNES. I hope we will adjourn until morning. Let us think it over.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the House will not adjourn until we dispose of this.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MILNES] that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MILNES) there were—ayes 100, noes 80.

Mr. MILES. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker——

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 5, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. HOAR. In the statement in the Journal of the ruling of the Chair yesterday on the point of order that the proper notice had not been given of a proposed change of the rules, I observe that the Journal represents the Chair as stating that the Senate, "by its deliberate action," had waived the necessity of notice. I do not conceive that the phrase "by its deliberate action" is appropriate to an action of the Senate where no debate is possible. A motion to take up any subject is not debatable under the rules. I think the Chair did not use the phrase "by its deliberate action" in his decision, but that it is an inadvertence of the clerks and had better be stricken out, and the statement made that the Chair ruled that the Senate by its action had waived the necessity of a notice, without using the phrase I have indicated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal will be corrected in the manner suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, and as corrected it stands approved.

KILLING OF ITALIAN LABORERS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

In my last annual message allusion was made to the lawless killing of certain Italian laborers in the State of Colorado, and it was added that "the dependent families of some of the unfortunate victims invite, by their deplorable condition, gracious provision for their needs."

It now appears that, in addition to three of these laborers who were riotously killed, two others who escaped death by flight incurred pitiable disabilities through exposure and privation.

Without discussing the question of the liability of the United States for these results, either by reason of treaty obligations or under the general rules of international law, I venture to urge upon the Congress the propriety of making from the public Treasury prompt and reasonable pecuniary provision for those injured and for the families of those who were killed.

To aid in the consideration of the subject, I append hereto a report of the Secretary of State, accompanied by certain correspondence which quite fully presents all the features of the several cases.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 3, 1896.

COAST DEFENSE ESTIMATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 31, 1895, a statement as to the amount of money which can be advantageously used for the purpose of coast defense prior to July 1, 1897, and the amount which should be made available during the present fiscal year, also an estimate of what portion of the amount is required for sites for fortifications, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Washington, D. Mr. COCKRELL. I present sundry memorials from different parts of the United States, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 214, authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River to the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, from some suitable point between the north line of St. Clair County, Ill., and the southwest line of that county. The bill has already been passed by the Senate. I move that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Commander Joseph Marthon, which will be introduced by me when that order is reached.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIM OF CHEROKEE COMMISSION.

Mr. TURPIE. I present a communication from Warren G. Sayre, of Wabash, Ind., transmitting a statement of facts relative to the claim of the Cherokee commission against the Government for unpaid services. I move that the communication and accompanying statement be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I introduce a paper which I suppose should be presented as a memorial. It is very brief. It was addressed to me, and is as follows:

Whereas E. O. WOLCOTT, the junior Senator of this State, has on the floor of the United States Senate stated that the "Monroe doctrine" has been misapplied, and made statements un-American and in contradiction to the feelings of the people he should represent:

Resolved, That the Denver Trades and Labor Assembly do repudiate his proclamation made in the Senate Chamber; and we declare our support to the President and Congress in their attitude against the British Government and the Government's position applicable to the Monroe doctrine.

JOHN W. BRAMWOOD, President.
HARVEY SCHARREL, Secretary.

A similar copy was sent to the Secretary of the Senate, and the Trades and Labor Assembly evidently desire that the paper shall receive some official recognition. I have taken the liberty, therefore, of presenting it as a memorial, and ask that it be placed on the files.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will lie on the table, the resolution having been reported.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1464) for the relief of the estate of Michael Knight, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 74) for the relief of William Wolfe, of Shelbina, Shelby County, Mo., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 93) to permit Anna M. Colman, a widow, to prosecute a claim, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1767) to provide for subports of entry and delivery, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PASCO. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 479) to make Anclote, in the State of Florida, a subport of entry, to report it adversely, the matter being provided for in the bill which I have just reported favorably. I move that the bill adversely reported be indefinitely postponed.

I should ask for the indefinite postponement of the bill except that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] desires to have it placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to inquire of the Senator who reports the bill whether it was considered by the Judiciary Committee? I make the inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether that committee has given careful attention to the questions involved, in the belief that there ought to be some legislation looking to restrictions of the courts of the United States in reference to the appointment of receivers of corporations.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that the bill was considered by the subcommittee individually and as a subcommittee, and their report was made to the full committee, which authorized the adverse report.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask, instead of an indefinite postponement, that the bill be placed upon the Calendar, as I may desire to make some remarks upon it at some time during the session. I think something ought to be done in the matter.

Mr. CLARK. That course is satisfactory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 895) for the relief of Christopher Ellis, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 66) for the relief of Moses Pendergrass, of Missouri, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

ELECTRIC WIRES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the 12th day of December last I introduced resolutions relating to placing telegraph, telephone, and other wires in the District of Columbia under ground, and they were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I am directed by that committee to report a substitute resolution for those then offered, and as it is a simple resolution of inquiry I will ask that it may be immediately considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution reported as a substitute will be read.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to report to the Senate whether, since the 15th day of September, 1888, any permits have been issued for the construction or erection of additional overhead wires in the District of Columbia, and if so, to whom such permits were given and under what authority of law the same purport to have been issued, together with a list of such permits, and whether thereunder any additional overhead wires have been erected in said District, and if so, where and by whom the same have been erected. Also, whether under the said act of March 3, 1891, or under any other act, any permits have been issued by said Commissioners for placing underground, in any of the avenues, streets, alleys, sidewalks, footways, or other public ways in the District of Columbia, any conduits or subways for electric wires which were not an addition to or extension of a previously existing conduit or subway established under previous existing law, and if so, the names of the persons or corporations to whom such permits have been issued, the avenues, streets, alleys, footwalks, or other passageways covered by such permits; also, what work, if any, has been done under such permits, and by whom, and under what authority of law said permits purport to have been issued and said work performed.

SIOUX LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 417) to perfect the title of the United States to the tract of land lying on the west side of Lake Pepin and the Mississippi River, in the State of Minnesota, which belonged to the half-breeds or mixed bloods of the Dakota or Sioux Nation of Indians, and that it be indefinitely postponed. The whole question has been adjusted by the Interior Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the committee will be discharged and the bill indefinitely postponed.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. MORGAN. On the 29th day of January I had the honor to report certain concurrent resolutions from the Committee on Foreign Relations relating to Cuba. That committee now direct me to report a resolution as a substitute for the previous report. I take the liberty of saying that I concur in the substitute of the committee, which I ask to have read.

The concurrent resolution reported as a substitute was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in the opinion of Congress, a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and that the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. The report heretofore made as a declaration of facts, of course, will remain as a part of this report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator from Alabama ask to have made of the resolution now reported?

Mr. MORGAN. I merely ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CALL. I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to take up for consideration the report made by the Committee on Foreign Relations in regard to Cuba as soon as I can get the attention of the Senate to the matter.

Mr. VEST. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Did not the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania go to the Calendar yesterday?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It did not.

Mr. QUAY. It went over under the rule one day.

Mr. HALE. It comes up this morning in regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution went over under objection.

Mr. VEST. I thought it went to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It did not go to the Calendar, the Chair will state. If there are no further resolutions, concurrent or other, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], coming over from a previous day.

Mr. VEST. I forget the exact date, but I think upon Thursday last the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] was before the Senate, and the morning hour lacked ten minutes of expiration. I took the floor upon that resolution and asked unanimous consent that it should go over as unfinished business in the morning hour without losing its place, and that understanding was had. Without pretending to be an expert on parliamentary law, I do not understand how a resolution subsequently offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania now takes precedence in the morning hour.

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that that is the understanding I had of the matter, and I think if the Senator from North Dakota desires to call up the resolution he has a right to do so. Being a prior resolution, it has precedence. I have not understood that the Senator from North Dakota has called it up. If he intends to do so, now is the time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state, in reply to the Senator from Missouri, that the resolution to which he refers was a joint resolution and was under discussion and the morning hour expired during the time——

Mr. VEST. I beg pardon. The morning hour did not expire, for I looked at the clock and it lacked ten minutes of 2. I called the attention of the Senate to that fact, and I said then that I was prepared to go on with the few remarks I intended to make, but that it would be unpleasant to be cut off by the expiration of the morning hour. Therefore I asked by unanimous consent that it should go over without prejudice, not losing its place, to be taken up in the morning hour the next day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. VEST. That it be taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. QUAY. What is the request?

Mr. VEST. To call up the joint resolution in charge of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] in regard to the distribution of seeds.

Mr. QUAY. I will object if it is the understanding of the Chair that the resolution offered by me is in order.

Mr. VEST. Then I move to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to make a statement, after which I am satisfied that the Senator from Pennsylvania will recognize the propriety of the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri. That Senator was just about to open his remarks upon the joint resolution——

Mr. QUAY. I will say, if the Senator will permit an interruption, that I could not hear what was said by the Senator from Missouri, and I do not understand exactly his request.

Mr. FAULKNER. I was just about to state what took place, for I was present when it occurred. The Senator from Missouri was about beginning his remarks on the joint resolution, when he looked at the clock and found it was within a few minutes of 2. He said he would not like to be cut off in five or ten minutes, and he asked unanimous consent, as I understood him at the time, that the joint resolution should be passed over and take its place the next legislative day in the morning hour, so that he could deliver his remarks. That was on Wednesday, and as I understood at that time his request was agreed to. The joint resolution was not called up on Thursday, Friday, or Saturday, because there was no morning hour on those days, the Senate having taken a recess from Wednesday evening until Thursday, and on from that time until Saturday, so that Tuesday was the next legislative day.

Mr. QUAY. On that statement of the case I withdraw my objection, with the understanding that my resolution shall come up when the Senator from Missouri concludes his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and recognizes the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. I do not want any misunderstanding about this matter. The Senator from Pennsylvania says he withdraws his objection with the understanding that his resolution shall come up when I conclude my remarks.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Missouri can not control that matter.

Mr. VEST. Of course not; I would not undertake to do it; but I do not want any misapprehension about it. I would not agree to that.

Mr. MILLS. Let the Senator from Pennsylvania make a motion to take it up if he wants to do so.

Mr. VEST. He can move to take it up; but I will not agree that it shall come up as a matter of course. I ask that the joint resolution in charge of the Senator from North Dakota——

Mr. ALDRICH. Before this arrangement is concluded we had better understand definitely what the agreement is.

Mr. VEST. There is no agreement about it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to withdraw his objection with the understanding that his resolution should come up after the Senator from Missouri concludes his remarks.

Mr. VEST. There was no such understanding.

Mr. QUAY. Then I will modify my suggestion to this extent: I will withdraw the objection with the understanding that my resolution suffers no prejudice by the withdrawal.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am quite sure that the consideration of the joint resolution can be concluded within three-quarters of an hour, if there is no objection to going on with it. If the Senator from Missouri is permitted to proceed we shall get it out of the way and the Senator from Pennsylvania will have the right of way immediately thereafter.

Mr. GRAY. I merely wish to say that the joint resolution moved to be taken up by the Senator from Missouri is one that is important and excites some interest, and I would not want to be concluded from saying something in regard to it if I feel that it is right to do so, and get the floor upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is important to the Senator from Pennsylvania and this side of the Senate that we shall understand exactly what this arrangement is to be.

Mr. VEST. There is no arrangement about it.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from Missouri now goes on, does the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania yesterday retain its place in the morning hour, and is it to be laid before the Senate to-morrow morning or whenever this order of business is again reached?

Mr. FAULKNER. The rules of the Senate govern this matter without any trouble. If the consideration of the joint resolution is concluded——

Mr. ALDRICH. I was addressing my remarks to the Chair, and I should like to have him answer the question if he will.

Mr. FAULKNER. That may be true, but I want to give my view of the matter. I say if the joint resolution upon which the Senator from Missouri will speak is concluded before the morning hour expires, then the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. But suppose it is not concluded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair can answer the inquiry of the Senator from Rhode Island. The resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania comes over from a previous day, and it is entitled to be laid before the Senate as a part of the morning business. At the conclusion of the joint resolution called up by the Senator from Missouri, unless the morning hour has expired, the resolution will be laid before the Senate, and if not, it will be laid before the Senate on the next legislative day.

Mr. QUAY. That is satisfactory.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me a moment to ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of Senate bill 1591, which is a bill of local character to my State, and it is of very great importance that it should pass Congress at an early day? It has the favorable recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and will cause no debate, I apprehend.

Mr. VEST. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1591) to extend the mineral-land laws of the United States to lands embraced in the north half of the Colville Indian Reservation.

Mr. WILSON. The bill was reported by me yesterday from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The Secretary read the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, which was to add the following at the end of the bill:

Provided, That the land used and occupied for school purposes at what is known as Tonasket school, on Bonapart Creek, and the site of the sawmill, grist mill, and other mill property on said reservation, is hereby reserved from the operation of this act, unless other lands are selected in lieu thereof as provided in section 6 of the act which became a law, without the approval of the President, July 1, 1892, entitled "An act to provide for the opening of a part of the Colville Reservation in the State of Washington, and for other purposes."

Mr. PALMER. I wish to ask the Senator from Washington in what manner the rights of the Indians are preserved in this bill? I understand that it is to extend the mining laws over an Indian reservation, or a part of it. I want to know, if I can, how it affects the rights of the Indians in that reservation.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, some four years ago Congress passed a bill opening the north half of the Colville Indian Reservation, and providing for a survey and allotment. The Indians are all located upon the south half of the reservation, having now about a million and a half acres. An appropriation was made for a survey, but owing to the vast amount of work before the Commissioner of the General Land Office he never has been able to examine and approve the surveys which have been made.

Upon the discovery of valuable mineral lands in what is known as British Columbia, it was supposed that the mineral zone extended across into this reservation. No Indian can take up and develop mineral land unless he is a citizen of the United States.

The proposition now is, and it has been favorably reported by the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to allow the prospectors to go in there and locate those lands; and unless they are permitted to do so at an early day, it will take the Army of the United States to keep them out, and ultimately result in no good. The passage of this bill is desired by all the people in the West. It does the Indian no harm. I should be as quick as any Senator to protect every right the Indian has, and in trying to get him to locate upon agricultural land; but this land is absolutely valueless, except for mineral purposes. It never can be surveyed, being a mountainous country. There is no objection to the passage of the bill on the part of any of the Departments who have fully examined the matter.

Mr. PALMER. Have the Indians been consulted about this, and are their rights in any manner secured? Do they receive any compensation whatever for the privileges proposed to be granted to miners by this bill?

Mr. WILSON. The Indians have no right whatever to this land. This is an executive order reservation. Before the bill passed Congress there was struck from it that portion recognizing the rights of the Indians upon the Colville Reservation and of any ownership in this land. Congress then established by law that the Indians had no title to the land in question.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to ask the Senator another question. If that is so, why is this legislation needed? This is an Indian reservation, and if the Indians have no rights there, what is the necessity for the extension of the mining laws over this particular territory? I am always suspicious of all legislation which affects the rights of Indians. I can understand how these lands may be exceedingly valuable to others, and of no value to the Indians; I can understand how it is that the Indians may or may not have rights to the lands proposed to be subjected to the operation of the mining laws; but still there is something suspicious about this whole matter of appropriating lands in which the Indians may have an interest, without any provision whatever being made for the protection of their rights, or without any compensation for any loss they may sustain.

I know the Indians have been driven from the valuable lands of the West to the mountains, and sometimes I know that they have been driven from the mountains, and then it has been claimed that the mountain lands were of no value to them. One pretext is that the valley lands are too good for them, and then that the mountain lands are not suited to their condition. It seems to me it is like saying they have no rights.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois is mistaken. The Indians who are on that portion of the reservation, numbering about 2,000, have a million and a half acres of land left. There are no Indians upon the portion of the reservation which we are seeking to have opened.

Mr. COCKRELL. And they have no claim there?

Mr. WILSON. No, they have no claim there, and could not take up any mineral lands unless they declared their intention to become citizens of the United States. The land is only valuable for mineral purposes. No Indians are there, and our citizens are not seeking to take advantage of any Indian. In every case the Indian is to be protected in all his rights.

The bill is of great importance to the white people of my section of the country and it will be ultimately impossible to keep them out of there, for as soon as the weather grows warmer they are going in. I have endeavored to hasten the passage of the bill upon the floor of the Senate, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington a question. Is it the whole of the reservation which is proposed to be opened, or only a part of it?

Mr. WILSON. It is only the half which, by the Senator's assistance, we opened four years ago.

Mr. CALL. The north or south half?

Mr. WILSON. The north half.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE SEEDS, ETC.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins.

Mr. VEST. I ask that the joint resolution, with the amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase and distribute valuable seeds for the year 1896, as has been done in preceding years, and as the public exigency requires that the valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, to be purchased under the authority of the said act and by the said appropriation, may be ready for distribution at the earliest possible date, the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to procure them by open purchase or contract at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold: Provided, That the said Secretary shall not, in said purchase, pay more than a reasonable and fair price for such commodities or for any of them: And provided further, That he shall not be required to expend all the appropriation available for said purchase, but only so much thereof as, considering the time when distribution can be made, may profitably be expended to promote the objects of this joint resolution.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I assume that the amendment proposed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has practically eliminated the very learned argument of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in regard to the Senate constituting itself a court and issuing a mandamus upon the Secretary of Agriculture, and also in regard to the other point, that the Senate in passing the original resolution would infringe upon the functions of the Chief Executive, whose duty it is to see that the laws are faithfully enforced. As amended, the joint resolution simply directs, as we unquestionably have the right to do, the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase and distribute gratuitously seeds, as had been done in preceding years.

I am not prepared to say that with what I believe to be the opinions and purposes of the Secretary of Agriculture, he will not undertake to nullify even this joint resolution. I am satisfied that his intention, if he can possibly avoid it, is not to distribute these seeds at all. I shall undertake to prove, from his own declaration, his statement that he has not the right by law, and is not empowered to distribute seeds, as has been done for so many years, is a mere pretense and pretext to conceal his settled animosity to the distribution of seed at all, and his intention to accentuate before the public what has been stated by the newspapers, that this is a reckless expenditure of money by Congressmen in order to popularize themselves with their constituents.

All this talk about the Secretary of Agriculture having discovered that he did not have the power to distribute these seeds is simply a sham to cover up his settled determination and purpose not to distribute them at all, and to bring all of us into disrepute who dare to advocate this gratuitous distribution as it has been carried on for so many years. I assume, then, that under this amended joint resolution all the technical arguments and learning of the Senator from Mississippi go for nothing, and that we have the right to direct this executive officer—not to request, but to direct him—to distribute seeds as has been done heretofore. No executive officer of this Government has the right to set up his will and his opinion against that of the legislative department in regard to a question of this kind; and whatever may be his conduct hereafter, if this resolution as amended is passed, it brings him face to face with the legislative will. He can violate it if he chooses, but this resolution will fix his responsibility as the head of a Department under the law and Constitution.

Mr. President, it is a serious statement for me to make that I believe the Secretary of Agriculture has determined not to make a gratuitous distribution of seeds. I have not made that statement recklessly nor carelessly. I have made it because I think I have the proof; because I unquestionably so believe. It is a most remarkable fact that the Secretary of Agriculture boasts in his statement made before the joint Committees of Agriculture of the two Houses of Congress, which I have before me, that during the three years of his administration of the Department of Agriculture he distributed 8,631,000 more packages of seeds than did his Republican predecessor during the last three years of Harrison's Administration. Mr. Morton boasts that he exceeded his predecessor in this "unlawful distribution" by 8,631,000 packages of seeds. Does any Senator believe that he discovered legitimately all at once that this power did not exist?

He says he has exhausted all "the rare and uncommon seeds," in the language of the law originally providing for this distribution. Grant that he did, and that his argument is good that there are no seeds now that can be discovered on the face of the earth which are rare and uncommon as to this country, does he expect us to believe that under the latter clause of the original provision that he should send valuable seed which can be made more profitable by being carried from one latitude or State to another, that he could not have enforced that provision of the law? What intelligent man believes that, with the changing climatic conditions of this country and with the improvements in agriculture and the processes for increasing the productiveness of soil, it is no longer possible to transport seeds from one State to another and make them more profitable?

The Senator from Mississippi aggressively asked us to give a single instance where seeds had been carried from one State to another and made more profitable. The Senator from Illinois answered that question. I answer it again. Within my personal knowledge the farmers of the State of Missouri are under eternal obligations to the Agricultural Department, or rather to the provisions of the law made by Congress requiring the Commissioner then, the Secretary of Agriculture now, to carry seeds from one State to another, because the farmers of Missouri under that provision obtained corn, which to-day is unrivaled upon the face of the earth, from the State of Illinois. The corn was brought to the State of Missouri from what is called Egypt, in southern Illinois, the culture of which revolutionized the corn culture in my State. But for this provision of law that could never have occurred.

Who does not know that in almost every neighborhood of the West to-day there are seeds and bulbs of incredible value to the people in those vicinities which came from the Department of Agriculture, not sent always in the most intelligent manner—I mean to say the officers did not know what would be the result when they caused this transportation from one vicinity to another—but the result has been to give to the people vegetable food of almost incredible value.

That the Secretary of Agriculture did not really base his objection upon the terms of the law is evident from a statement which he made before the joint Committees on Agriculture. In that statement he said:

> Of the few reports received during the years 1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896 all were so vague and indefinite, in a word, so manifestly perfunctory as to give no valuable experimental results or information whatever. It may be safely asserted, from all the evidence available in the Department, that for the $1,100,000 and over expended for seed distribution by the Department in the past ten years no visible practical benefit to general agriculture or horticulture has resulted.

And he goes on to say that even agricultural societies and the agricultural papers have condemned the practice and that no returns have been received, as had been requested when the seeds were sent to the parties who received them.

Mr. President, it is possible, it is probable, that the farmers who receive these seeds have not made reports as requested, because they are not in all cases literary in their tastes or pursuits, but the fact exists, and is known to every one of us who represents a Western State, that the most valuable results have come from this distribution.

The Secretary of Agriculture shows in his statement that his objection to the distribution is not based upon the terms of the law. He makes a general argument against the whole thing, and says the distribution has resulted in no good, and undertakes to prove from agricultural papers and resolutions from agricultural societies, which he does not give, to show that it is a useless expenditure of the public money.

Mr. President, the Democratic party has been most unfortunate, not only in the dissensions which exist in its own ranks, but in the fact that the devil, to use a Western phrase, has owed the party a grudge, and has paid us in a Secretary of Agriculture. [Laughter.] If that officer had taken a contract to make the party to which he ostensibly belongs odious with the farmers of the United States, he could not have carried it out more successfully. This attack upon agriculture commenced in 1884, when the President of the United States, in a formal annual message to Congress, said that the mails were loaded down with seeds for gratuitous distribution, used by Senators and Members of the House of Representatives to popularize themselves at home. This was the first blast upon the bugle, and the Secretary of Agriculture immediately took up the refrain, and has adhered to it ever since.

We are told the Secretary of Agriculture is entirely honest. His honesty is not in issue. It is a question of administration; it is a question of policy. Sir, almost every crime committed in history has been done by honest men. There never was yet a fanatic who howled in ecstasy around his victim burning at the stake who was not honest. I have no doubt the Turks who are now butchering the Christians in Armenia and flourishing their scimiters, dripping with Christian gore, and shouting "Allah Acbar! There is one God, and Mohammed is his prophet," are perfectly honest and think they will reap their reward in the Mohammedan paradise with black-eyed houris around them.

I believe the Secretary of Agriculture is honest enough. I do not attack his honesty; I attack his administration and his policy. He has committed what a great Frenchman said in regard to a public official is not a crime, but, what is far worse, a blunder. He has put the party to which he belongs in antagonism to the great agricultural interest of the country, which has heretofore been peculiarly close to the Democratic organization.

The founder of the Democratic party was the best friend the agricultural interest ever had upon this continent. It is a singular fact that Mr. Jefferson, when minister to France, and watching the great drama of the French Revolution, as he looked upon the French court at Versailles feasting and dancing, as some people are doing now, while the mob surged and roared like a wild beast in the streets of Paris, and while corresponding with the savants of Europe, sent home seeds and plants of all kinds in order to improve the agriculture of this country.

It is a singular fact that he traveled incognito over all the southern parts of France and across the Alps into Italy in order to find out why the planters of South Carolina did not have seed rice equal to that which was produced in Europe. In Italy he found the rice superior to any that had ever been known on this continent. He discovered that by Italian laws it could not be exported, and I am not ashamed to say that in the interests of agriculture the founder of our party turned smuggler and filled his pockets inside and out with the rice which he brought to Paris and shipped to Charleston, S. C., in small packages. It was carefully distributed and attended, and gave us the South Carolina rice which to-day is the finest in the world.

When William C. Rives was minister to France, in 1853, he states that in the rooms of the Royal Agricultural Society of the Seine, he saw the prize plow of Thomas Jefferson, which had received a medal from that society while he was minister to France. The Democratic party has always been peculiarly devoted to the farming interests of this country, and has derived its largest support from that source. It has never been the party of the capitalist and the rich man, but has always depended upon the people, on whom at last the prosperity of the country must rest.

Now comes an Administration which I assisted in putting into power and deliberately attacks that interest. The first thing that the Secretary of Agriculture did was to involve himself in a most unfortunate controversy with the agricultural associations of the United States, when he talked about the walking delegates and had in the newspapers a controversy with some of the leading farmers of the country.

After the President had denounced Congress as demagogues who were using the tax money of the people to popularize themselves at home, the Secretary of Agriculture felt himself authorized and called upon to continue the assault until it has culminated now in the striking down, against the intention of Congress and outside of the law, in my judgment, the objects which we had in view when we appropriated $130,000 for the purchase and distribution of seeds. But the Secretary of Agriculture shields himself behind the plea of economy. He claims that he has saved $1,350,000 to the people of this country in his administration, of which the $130,000 for seed turned back into the Treasury constitutes a part.

Mr. President, I am not here to assail economy in public affairs, but I must express my regret that the economy of the Secretary commenced against farmers when there were such flagrant abuses in the way of extravagance all around him and before him which would have commanded, or should have commanded, the attention of even an unobserving man. It is most remarkable that the Secretary of Agriculture has not one word of criticism for an expenditure of nearly $11,000,000 to a foreign syndicate to sustain the single-gold standard in this country. It is most astonishing that he has never been able to see the enormous expenditure, the profligate expenditure, in the way of public printing.

The basement of the Capitol and the upper rooms of the Capitol and all the spare rooms in the vicinity have been taken up by storing worthless volumes printed from year to year, for which there can be no possible use to any human being. To-day we have almost had a pestilence from the rotting paper in this Capitol, the old bureau reports, and worthless statistics. Yet the gigantic intellect of the Secretary of Agriculture has never been turned to this. He would not shield himself, nor could he shield himself, by pretending that it did not come within his immediate jurisdiction, because from day to day, and almost from hour to hour, he has gone outside the duties of his Department in order to perform gratuitously the functions which are placed upon other Cabinet officers.

He has been Secretary of the Treasury practically, and has flooded this country with pamphlets and interviews and speeches denouncing the silver lunatics and declaring that the single gold standard is absolutely necessary to the prosperity of the country.

But let us look further at the question of economy. He overlooked other appropriations made for his own Department, but struck out the $130,000 appropriation for the farmers. I find, from the report of the Secretary of expenditures made in the Agricultural Department for the year 1895, that $23,567.90 was expended upon the conservatories and grounds of the Agricultural Department. For 1897 we find for the Botanical Garden $23,893.75; for the propagating garden for 1897, $9,000; for the gardens and grounds of the Agricultural Department in 1897, improving the lawns, and for trees, water cans, tubs, composts, labor, etc., $25,000, making an aggregate of $57,893.75. For the fiscal year 1897, we find for public grounds and parks in the city of Washington alone an estimate of $81,000 and an actual appropriation of $49,500, making altogether, for these ornamental and luxurious appanages of the Government, an appropriation for that year of $105,393.75.

Will some Senator tell me what human being is fed by this expenditure? Will some Senator point out to me what table of any poor man has been made more comfortable by reason of this expenditure of $105,000? Where does this tax money of the people go under the immediate eye of the Secretary of Agriculture? It goes to the purchase of orchids, lilies of the valley, giant palms, and exotics that grace the banquets and receptions of the President and Cabinet officers in this city. But if we undertake to give a few papers of seeds to some poor farmer who has dragged through a long winter and is barely able to furnish the necessaries of life to the family depending upon him, liberty lies bleeding in the streets, and the Secretary of Agriculture calls, "To arms! To arms! Congress is throwing away the people's money and ruining the country."

Sir, I know that anyone who dares to make a criticism like this subjects himself to the studiedly graceful assaults of the metropolitan press, and I shall be called a demagogue, pandering to the haymakers of the West. I have been called a silver lunatic, an enemy of the public, a legislative communist, and I do not think I shall lose any sleep because I am called a seed demagogue.

I would rather vote twice the amount of this appropriation to give something to a poor man in a distant county of the West, who is fighting the hard battle of life unaided by Government, that would make his cheerless home comfortable and bring light to his fireside; I would rather put one flower in the sick room of an overworked girl or matron, than to have it said that I had voted a hundred thousand dollars for flowers and exotics for the receptions and banquets of the officials of this Government, where the chandelier flashes its light across the red wine and the air is fragrant with perfume like "the spicy breeze of Araby, the blessed." Just such things as this action of the Secretary have caused the people of this country to doubt whether this is a Government of the people and for the people; whether the poor have any rights except to pay taxes to support the Government of the rich.

No wonder that we hear such threats as this coming from Wall street. I ask the Secretary to read what I send to the desk, to show the spirit that is abroad in this country, not amongst the farmers, but amongst the brokers and speculators and capitalists.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SAFEGUARD FOR THE TREASURY GOLD.

As we said last week, Congress scarcely cuts any figure in the speculative situation. The only feature of the current proceedings of the National Legislature is that the Senate, which is the real obstacle to currency and other reforms, is sinking lower and lower in public estimation. Everything it does is calculated to bring it more and more into public contempt and to produce that coming explosion for which the people of the country are gradually but surely getting themselves ready. We feel that before the session ends the force of public opinion will make itself felt so strongly that

THE SENATE WILL BE FORCED TO DO ITS DUTY.

If it can not or will not, its members generally will suffer the most humiliating political chastisement that ever overtook a body of recreant legislators.

Mr. VEST. That comes from one of the first banking and brokerage houses in the city of New York, and it is but a sample of what is published every day from like sources. What do they mean by the coming explosion? The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has been denounced as a communist because he spoke of an incipient revolution in this country unless there was some legislative redress. Here is a statement from New York, from the capitalists of the country, that unless the Senate does the bidding of those capitalists, unless the Senate of the United States adopts their opinions and policies, a revolution is coming, a convulsion is coming, in the near future.

Mr. President, I must express my regret that if we are to have economy it should commence with a class the most defenseless politically of any in the United States. Scattered over a vast extent of territory with a continent for their scene of operations, the farmers are unable to organize and protect themselves as are other interests. They are of all the classes in this country within my personal knowledge more affected by the existing depression in business than any others.

According to the report of the Secretary of Agriculture himself, which I have before me, and of the Statistician of the Agricultural Department, there was a fall in the price of farm animals between 1894 and 1895 of $351,370,448. With wheat not paying the cost of production, with corn selling all over the West at from 12½ to 15 cents a bushel, with beef under the control of the Chicago syndicate who fix the price at their own will, now we must economize by taking away from the farmers of this country the only thing they receive from this great Government, the only thing that reminds them that the Government knows there is an agricultural class, which supports almost the entire burden of the Government. But I quote higher authority than the Secretary of Agriculture. I ask the Secretary to read from the message of the President of the United States a few years ago the part I have marked.

The Secretary read as follows:

Our farmers, long suffering and patient, struggling in the race of life with hardest and most unremitting toil, will not fail to see, in spite of misrepresentations and misleading fallacies, that they are obliged to accept such prices for their products as are fixed in foreign markets, where they compete with the farmers of the world; that their lands are declining in value while their debts increase; and that, without compensating favor, they are forced by the action of the Government to pay, for the benefit of others, such enhanced prices for the things they need that the scanty returns of their labor fail to furnish their support or leave no margin for accumulation.

Mr. VEST. In view of the statistics of the Secretary of Agriculture, and the official declarations of the President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the most remarkable public document that I have seen in nearly twenty years' service in this Chamber. If this does not make good what I have said in regard to the purpose of the Secretary of Agriculture and the real animus of his attack upon the appropriation of $130,000 for seeds, I am mistaken in regard to logical effect.

The Secretary of Agriculture, in his annual report, submitted at the beginning of the present session, undertakes to prove that the farmers are the most wealthy and prosperous class in the United States and that the bankers and capitalists are the most unfortunate. I have spoken of the extraordinary change that came over the Secretary of Agriculture after three years' distribution of seeds, when he discovered all at once that the law did not authorize him to continue the seed distribution.

About that time the silver agitation actively commenced in this country, and the agricultural districts very emphatically declared in favor of the free coinage of silver. The Secretary of Agriculture, instead of devoting himself to the legitimate functions of his Department, has been raiding every portion of the country upon the financial question. He ought to be Secretary of War and Secretary of the Treasury. The idea of his limiting his colossal capacity and analytical inquiries to cabbages, potatoes, beets, and pumpkins! When he sees a silver man he charges, he rushes from his office, reminding us of what Cicero says of Catiline's flight from the Senate, "abiit, efugit, evasit, erupit." [Laughter.] When the Secretary of Agriculture hears of a silver lunatic, like the war horse in Job, his neck is clothed with thunder. You might go further and say:

"He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha; and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting."

Now, will the Secretary read this extraordinary argument, showing that the farmers, instead of being unfortunate and their vocation depressed, are really the wealthy people of this country; that all their complaints are unfounded; that they have no right to say that farming is unprofitable in the United States; and he undertakes to prove it is the most profitable vocation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the presence of these facts, in the front of these figures demonstrating that agriculture in this Republic has during the year fed itself, supplied all citizens of the Union engaged in other vocations, and then shipped abroad a surplus of over $500,000,000 worth of its products, how can anyone dare to assert that farming is generally unremunerative and unsatisfactory to those who intelligently follow it?

How can the 42 per cent of the population of the United States, which feeds the other 58 per cent and then furnishes more than 69 per cent of all the exports of the whole people, be making less profits in their vocation than those whom they feed when the latter supply less than 31 per cent of the exports of the country?

For the purpose of illustrative comparison, transfer the $4,000 agriculturally invested in each farm of 137 acres to the choicest Wall street investment. Risk that money in railroad first-mortgage bonds, in bank stocks, or any other allegedly safe security which may be found a favorite among shylocks, brokers, plutocrats, monopolists, money-power manipulators, and multimillionaires, and if it returns 6 per cent it is a remarkably profitable investment in the eyes of capitalists. Therefore $240 is the annual income.

Follow the transfer of the farm money with that of the farm family to urban residence. Now, with the same labor in the city or village can they attain by hard work every day in the year, adding their wages to the $240 income, as much of independence, wholesome living, and real comfort as the same amount of money in the land and the same heads and hands working on the soil generously and healthfully bestowed upon them, in the sweet quiet of a home, amid flowers, trees, fruits, and abundance, on the farm?

But the declaimers of calamity declare that the farms of the United States are sadly burdened with mortgages. The census of 1890, however, develops the fact that on the entire valuation returned for farms there is only a mortgage of 16 per cent. It will be borne in mind, too, that many thousands of acres of mortgaged lands of great value which are returned as farms were such only before they were mortgaged. They were purchased to plat as additions to cities like Chicago, Brooklyn, Kansas City, and Omaha, and ceased to be farm lands as soon as mortgages representing part of the purchase price were recorded. Such lands are, therefore, wrongfully included and returned as farms. They show an aggregate of many millions of liabilities.

On each $10,000 of rural real estate there is, then, an average incumbrance of $1,600. And when the fact is recalled to mind that a large part of all farm mortgages is for deferred payments on the land itself, or for improvements thereon, what other real or personal property in the United States can show lesser liabilities, fewer liens in proportion to its real cash-producing value? Certainly the manufacturing plants of this country, neither smelting works, mills, iron and steel furnaces and foundries, nor any other line of industry can show less incumbrance on the capital invested.

* * * * * * *

During the year 1894, according to the five reports made that year to the Comptroller of the Currency, the average indebtedness to their depositors of the national banks was $1,685,756,062.45. Besides the above, State and private banks, loan and trust companies, and savings banks owed their depositors during the same period an average of $2,973,414,101, making a total of $4,659,170,163.45.

And in this year, 1895, by the responses of national banks to the four calls thus far made upon them by the Comptroller of the Currency, their aggregate indebtedness to depositors is shown to be $1,719,597,911.33; State and private banks, loan and trust companies, and savings banks show an aggregate indebtedness to their depositors of $3,185,245,810, making a total of $4,904,843,721.33.

These figures show an enormous and constant indebtedness of the banks and bankers, alongside of which the money in farm mortgages and the debts owed by farmers are relatively insignificant. The debts of railroads, bankers, manufacturers, and merchants entitle them, and not the farmers, to be called the "debtor class" in America.

* * * * * * *

It will be observed that between 1880 and 1890 the proportion of the people engaged in agriculture declined 2 per cent, and that to-day there are only 42 persons in rural pursuits to 58 in mercantile, manufacturing, and other callings common to the great populational and industrial centers. Fifty-eight per cent of the people can not always be satisfactorily maintained upon the profits of exchanges among themselves in the villages and cities. Food for all must come from the earth—from tilled fields. The population of the United States in 1915—a quarter of a century after the census of 1890—admitting that the increase will diminish very materially as compared with that of each preceding quarter of a century since the Government was established, will, no doubt, number at least 120,000,000.

Mr. VEST. I take it that the farmers of the United States will be profoundly astonished to find that they are the most prosperous class of our people, and that the capitalists and manufacturers are the poor unfortunate bankrupts. A public officer, himself coming from the West, who would dare to make the statement deliberately put before the American people in that paper, possesses courage and hardihood to which I do not aspire. The man who will say to the farmers of the United States that they are the recipients of the proceeds of the $504,000,000 of exports of agricultural products must calculate upon a credulity in the agricultural districts that is not comprehensible to those who have rural constituents.

Does not the Secretary of Agriculture know that the farmers do not receive this money, that it goes to the middlemen and to the exporters, and that, unfortunately, as the autonomy of our Government exists, the Federal Government is unable to destroy the combinations in the great grain markets of the United States which make the farmer the victim and put the proceeds of his toil in the hands of those who "toil not, neither do they spin?"

But there is another statement made in that paper even more astounding. It is the most remarkable I have ever known to come from a Department of this Government. The Secretary of Agriculture says that the banks and savings institutions are in debt over $4,000,000,000. In debt to whom? To their depositors. In other words, they have the money of the people, which they receive without paying interest and which the banks are loaning out at from 6 to 10 per cent and even more, and the Secretary of Agriculture says that this is an indebtedness which shows their most unfortunate financial condition. I have been under the impression that the bank which had the largest deposits was the most fortunate, and although in their bookkeeping the deposits are charged up as an indebtedness of the bank, we know that it constitutes the great desideratum with bankers and gives them their largest profit.

Is it possible the Secretary of Agriculture thinks that the people of the United States are such idiots and dolts as not to understand this? Does he expect us to believe that the manufacturers of the East and the operatives of New England, with their millions and even billions of dollars in the savings banks, are not really the fortunate class in this country but the unfortunate class, and that the farmers, as Mr. Morton says in that report, are deriving larger profits upon their capital than any other portion of the community?

Mr. President, the trouble with the Secretary of Agriculture is that he is a monomaniac on the subject of the gold standard. He sees nothing but gold, red gold, and he believes that every man who can not understand the question as he does is a lunatic and ought to be regarded as a public enemy. I saw it in a newspaper, and I heard it from one of the employees in the Department besides, and I take it there will be no contradiction of the fact, that the Secretary of Agriculture absolutely paid off his employes, men and women, who are supposed to be favorable to the free coinage of silver, with silver dollars, in order, as he said, to give them an object lesson as to the use of silver.

I was abroad at the time, but I saw the publication. It was published in a British newspaper, and I understand it was published all over the United States. I was told by one of the employees that he had received $150, I think it was, in silver dollars, and as he was a little lame and rather decrepit he was afraid he would be compelled to hire a cab in order to get to his boarding house. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] asks me why the Secretary did not give him silver certificates. Because he wanted to give him an object lesson, cynically showing what could come if the silver dollar was coined again in the United States.

In that day of gloom and disaster, when the Democratic party was overwhelmingly defeated at the last election, and true Democrats everywhere through this country were mourning over the result, I saw a carefully prepared interview with the Secretary of Agriculture in which he gloated over it. Io triumphe! he said. Maryland, Kentucky, and Ohio have gone for the Republicans, and the Judases have been struck down who in the Senate opposed the Administration.

Mr. President, I thank God the time has never come, and it never will come, when I will gloat over seeing the Democratic flag in the dust, no matter by whom that banner may have been borne. No true Democrat will ever do that. But the Secretary of Agriculture could see nothing except that men who differed from him have been struck down in public life, and he, a member of the Democratic Administration, came out publicly and gloated over it, and shouted with ghoulish glee over the defeat of members of his own party.

The Secretary of Agriculture delivered a speech in New York on the 19th of January, which was published in the New York Herald, and which any Senator can obtain from the Library, in which he asks, "What do these politicians at Washington know about finance? Why do not you capitalists and bankers and business men demand a monetary commission to regulate the finance of the country, and force Congress to accept its decision? Go to Washington and make them take it. What do these politicians know about finances and gold and silver? What do they know about exchanges, except the exchange of one set of official applicants for another?" And his speech was received with tumultuous applause by the audience before whom it was delivered.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Board of Trade.

Mr. VEST. The Secretary of Agriculture is now devoting himself to sending over this country stereotyped questions to silver men. I have a letter here from the agent of the American Press Association in New York stating that he has received from the Secretary of Agriculture an autograph letter containing the following questions to the silver men of the country which have been submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury and pronounced by him to be irrefutable. The agent of the press association asked me, as I am considered quite a silver man, to answer the questions.

The Secretary of Agriculture can not contain himself within the limited functions of his vegetable kingdom. [Laughter.] He has now resumed his old profession of editor, and is filling the country with attacks upon those of us who happen to be unable to see this money question in the same light with himself. Having mentioned these questions, without injecting a silver debate, I will ask the Secretary, in justice to the Secretary of Agriculture and myself, to read my reply.

Mr. GEORGE. The questions should also be read.

Mr. VEST. The questions are included in the paper. Let the Secretary read the questions and then read my answers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The questions and replies will be read in the absence of objection. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

The first question is as follows:

"If by international agreement the price of silver can be fixed and made permanent, in gold, why can not the prices of all other commodities be made permanent and unfluctuating by the same process?"

Commodities such as corn, wheat, iron, lead, etc., can be produced in unlimited quantities beyond the capacity or requirements of consumption, while silver never has been so produced.

This question assumes that silver is always a commodity like corn, wheat, or cotton, and ignores the fact that when made money by law, national or international, it becomes, within the jurisdiction so enacting, not a commodity, but the representative of all values.

To ask why international agreement can not fix the price of commodities is foreign to the issue.

When stamped as money and made full legal tender, silver is not a commodity in the narrow and restricted meaning of that term, but represents the value of all commodities. It may be used for mechanical and manufacturing purposes, but its money function comes from law, and is overwhelming in importance.

Secretary Morton persistently adheres to the fallacy that the commercial value of silver, as caused by closing the mints against its coinage, will not be affected by restoring the metal to its position prior to 1873. The opening of the mints of the world, or even of the United States, to free coinage would give silver equal purchasing and debt-paying power with gold.

What owner of silver bullion, outside of a lunatic asylum, would sell it at the present market price if the mints were open to coinage? The intrinsic value of silver, as of gold, comes almost entirely from their adaptability to the purposes of being used as money, and this use can only be established by law. To attempt an analogy between silver and commodities is illogical and utterly deceptive.

The second question is as follows:

"When the advocate of free and unlimited coinage declares for 16 to 1, does he not give away his case and assert himself for a gold standard as 'the one' by which to measure silver and everything else?"

I must confess my inability to appreciate this question.

Does Secretary Morton mean that no ratio of coinage can be fixed by law between gold and silver, as has been done since civilized governments were established?

If his question means anything, it is that no ratio can be established between gold and silver which recognizes the difference in quantity, texture, and value of the metals and does not preserve exact equality in coinage, without inconsistency in the lawmakers.

If the Secretary is right, the world has been blundering on the subject of coined money through all the ages; and the framers of our Constitution, Hamilton, Jay, and Madison, with all the financiers who succeeded them, have been gabbling like idiots when they discussed the proper ratio between the precious metals.

Secretary Morton is certainly mistaken when he says that Secretary Carlisle declared these questions irrefutable.

No one, who remembers Mr. Carlisle's burning denunciation of monometallism when a member of the House can believe that he now indorses the monstrous proposition that no ratio of coinage can be established between gold and silver.

The third question is as follows:

"Customs dues are based upon the value of imports computed in American or United States currency. The law compels the Secretary of the Treasury at the beginning of each quarter to proclaim value of foreign coins in United States money. Now, the English pound is $4.866 on a gold basis. Importing £100 worth of merchandise from England to-day, you would pay duty on $486 valuation. But going to a silver basis the English pound would be in United States currency $9.72—doubled. Therefore, the duties on the same goods would be doubled, would they not?"

Imports are paid for in the money of the country where purchased, and the value of such imports is estimated in our units of value—dollars and cents—and not in the commercial or market value of the metal constituting such coined dollars. This has been done ever since 1878.

In this question Secretary Morton again ignores the effect of free coinage upon silver, and falsely assumes that this country would at once go to a silver basis. He adheres to the fallacy that free coinage would add nothing to the commercial value of silver, in face of the fact that when the act of 1873 demonetized silver its commercial value fell and when the Bland-Allison Act provided in 1878 for limited coinage the commercial value increased.

No intelligent man can be induced to believe that the silver dollar, which is a full legal tender, and with which all the products of this great country can be purchased, will be worth only 50 cents anywhere.

If the foreigner can buy our exports for silver dollars, or can invest these dollars in property within our borders, why should he value them at one-half their purchasing power?

The legal-tender money of every country is worth everywhere what the products of that country are worth after providing for its own people. The silver dollar of Mexico is worth only 62 cents outside of that conntry, because Mexico exports some silver, a little coffee, and a few hides, but the silver dollar and silver certificate of the United States are exchangeable for gold all over Europe, because we are the largest exporting people in the world.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have had read this correspondence, giving the questions of the Secretary of Agriculture and the answers which I had attempted to make, as being just to him and myself. I can supplement the last statement in regard to silver certificates and silver dollars of the United States by a personal experience. I happened to be abroad last summer and found that I had some silver certificates, and I presented them to a banker in Austria to whom I carried my letter of credit. I said, "I assume, as these are silver certificates, there is some discount upon them." "Not at all, sir," he said, "you can have gold for them as you could have it for the pounds sterling."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. VEST. If the Senate will indulge me just a moment I will conclude.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Missouri may proceed to the conclusion of his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. VEST. I was proceeding to state that this banker gave me gold for the silver certificates. I said to him, "Have you noticed that these are simply certificates entitling the holder to receive silver dollars?" "Why, of course," he said; "this is my business, and I understand exactly what I am doing. My dear sir, that silver certificate will purchase anything that is produced by the people of the United States. It is as good to me as gold. I can buy your corn, your wheat, your beef, your oil. Why should it not be as good, coming from a great country like yours, that is feeding half the world?"

Therefore, I say that I speak within personal knowledge when I declare that the silver of the United States is good over the whole world. It is as good as gold so long as we continue to feed our own people and export the enormous amount of five hundred and odd million dollars worth of products, which is referred to by the Secretary of Agriculture in his report. But I do not purpose to discuss now the silver question.

Mr. President, the Secretary of Agriculture attacks the distribution of seed, but there is one seed which he is now propagating and distributing most industriously through this country. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] was grimly facetious over the name of some of the botanical products which were offered for sale to the Department. I take the liberty of saying that this seed being now distributed is known by botanists as the aurifer feniculum canis Mortoni; in other words, Morton's golden dog fennel. [Laughter.] Under the shadow of this noxious plant he reposes by day and almost dreams by night, occasionally seeking recreation by swinging his golden censer, filled with incense, at the Executive Mansion, and shouting: "Holy, holy, art thou, oh Grover, king of kings and lord of lords." [Laughter.]

PORTRAIT OF THE LATE JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to submit a report from the Judiciary Committee. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 103) to authorize the Attorney-General to transfer to William Henry Clifford a portrait of the late Mr. Justice Clifford, now in the Department of Justice, to report it without amendment. I ask leave to put the joint resolution upon its passage now. Let it be read for information. If it takes more than thirty seconds I will withdraw it.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have a letter of the Attorney-General printed in the RECORD. It is not necessary to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1896.

SIR: In reply to your note of the 3d instant in relation to the resolution, H. Res. 103, the Attorney-General directs me to say that the late Mr. Justice Clifford during his lifetime had a portrait of himself painted—which is now in the collection of portraits belonging to the Department of Justice—to take the place of an indifferent one theretofore furnished the Department and still remaining here. There is no reason why the resolution should not pass; on the contrary, it is eminently proper that it should.

Very respectfully,

CECIL CLAY, Chief Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
United States Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 67) authorizing the St. Louis, Oklahoma and Southern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 573) for the relief of Frances R. Jack, Elizabeth J. Jack, and Matilda W. Jack;

A bill (H. R. 1816) for the relief of Michael Ryan; and

A bill (H. R. 4444) providing for commissioners to negotiate with certain Indians for the surrender or modification of any rights claimed by them to hunt on the unoccupied public domain of the United States.

PROPOSED DISTRIBUTION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution, by Mr. DUBOIS, proposing an amendment to paragragh 1 of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Idaho in charge of the unfinished business consent that it be informally laid aside that the Senate may take up, and I hope finish this afternoon, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. DUBOIS. No, Mr. President; yesterday I yielded to the Senator from Maine as soon as the resolution was up that he might call up the deficiency appropriation bill. Now I think that we can finish the resolution to-day, and under the circumstances I do not think it would be fair to the friends of this measure to yield at this time.

Mr. HALE. Of course I understand that the matter entirely rests with the Senator from Idaho. He did yesterday make that proposition. At the time I did not know that any debate would ensue. I have learned since that there will be more or less extended debate, and I felt the necessity of passing the urgent deficiency appropriation bill as soon as possible. But if the Senator objects, of course there is nothing more that can be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. HALE. What is that amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. SEWELL. I shall forego pressing the amendment at the present time. It may require the joint action of both Houses, and I shall probably bring in a joint resolution.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. SEWELL. The amendment is to take the Soldiers' Homes appropriations out of the sundry civil appropriation bill and put them into the Army appropriation bill in case the latter bill is to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HILL. Is the amendment withdrawn, do we understand the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SEWELL. I do not intend to press the amendment at the present time. While I am on my feet I desire to say a few words.

Mr. HALE. I have requested that the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 17, after the words "Military Academy," insert "and the National and State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and Sailors."

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I do not intend to take the time of the Senate. I believe the vote yesterday demonstrated that time taken up in making speeches on this question is practically wasted; therefore I will confine the few remarks that I shall make to the appropriateness of the Committee on Military Affairs having charge of the appropriation bill for the Army. That committee is constituted more nearly to cover technically the duties that it could perform in that respect than any other committee of this body. It is composed of gentlemen who attained high rank on both sides in the late war, who are perfectly conversant with everything that is likely to come up in the Army appropriation bill and could give much time to its consideration, whereas under the present rule that appropriation bill comes over from the other House with twelve or fourteen others late in the session and is referred to a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations.

I may here say that the work of the Committee on Appropriations was my admiration in my former term of service, and it has not changed, I presume. I have never seen such superhuman labor performed as those gentlemen have accomplished intelligently, justly, and properly. There is no reason that I could offer for taking away appropriation bills from them except the fitness of the other committees named to take them into consideration. They are fully as competent as the Committee on Appropriations; they are more so technically, referring to the Military Committee. I was surprised to hear the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] say that the military appropriation bill is a matter of form and detail, of pay, etc.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator from New Jersey aware that the matter of delay which has invoked the superhuman efforts of the Appropriations Committee in the closing days of a session is almost entirely the result of the late day at which the separate committees of the House of Representatives get their bills through and send them here? The experience of the Senate has been, since the change was made in the other House, that the bills which are delayed and come laggardly here are not the bills from the Committee on Appropriations, although six bills are left to that committee in the House, but the bills from the single committees that dally through the session, the committees having only one appropriation bill to deal with; and they are sent here so late that they crowd the Appropriations Committee. It is fair that the Senator should, if he does not know that——

Mr. SEWELL. Oh, I am perfectly conversant with it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator knows that. I am very glad that he realizes it.

Mr. SEWELL. But I am also conversant with the general idea that while the bills come in that way they can be taken up and dealt with by five or six committees better than by one.

Mr. HALE. The House experience does not show that. If we are found confronted with long continued delay by the special committees relating to the particular Department in the House, I can not see why the same thing is not likely to occur in the Senate. The committees of the Senate, whichever they may be, will not get the appropriation bills from the several committees of the other House until the last days of the session, and we shall be in a worse condition to deal with the whole subject of appropriations than would be the case when they are dealt with by one committee.

Mr. SEWELL. We have a difference of opinion on that point. The Military Committee would be taking care of the military appropriation bill, and the Naval Committee of the naval appropriation bill, while the Committee on Appropriations would have the sundry civil appropriation bill and the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he expects the members of all these committees named to leave the Senate as the members of the Committee on Appropriations do during the last weeks of a session, and that the committees will sit during the hours when the Senate is in session so as to deal with these respective subjects?

Mr. SEWELL. I do not see why they should not do so just as much as the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. HOAR. Then does the Senator expect any sessions of the Senate, a quorum of the Senate?

Mr. SEWELL. Oh, yes; there will be no trouble about that. But I wish to address my remarks more particularly to the fitness of the Military Committee to have charge of the Army appropriation bill. The members of that committee know more of the details than the Appropriations Committee possibly can know. It is in the line of their thoughts and their learning in the service; they take pride in it. A man who served during the war, all the war, on either side, never forgets his military education.

Mr. HALE. Granting all that to be true about the meritorious services of men in the war, does the Senator think that a committee of warriors is really more competent to decide how much money shall be appropriated for military purposes in view of all the appropriations to be made than a committee composed of men of peace?

Mr. SEWELL. Oh, well, the gentlemen composing that committee are now men of peace, and they have been for thirty years. They have not forgotten their education in the war, but they are men who have demonstrated their fitness to live in peace and earn a living.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly, but does the Senator think that that committee, composed, as it is, of able men, patriotic men, competent men, is better able to consider the question of how much money, taking into view the whole condition of the Government, shall be apportioned to the War Department, than a general committee which has no prejudices for or against any Department?

Mr. SEWELL. They are better competent to take up subjects such as they deal with every day and such as the Committee on Appropriations never consider—new inventions, etc. The Committee on Military Affairs have more knowledge of such subjects and of the technical matters regarding the military establishment than the Senator's committee can ever get hold of.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Appropriations never allows itself to deal with a question of new inventions any more than it would with a question of the future salvation of man. It sends every new invention pertaining to the Army to the Military Committee. It never pretends to consider such questions, though the committee is constantly beset with inventions from the Navy Department as well as the War Department. Whenever such things come to the Appropriations Committee, we send the naval inventions to the Naval Committee and the military inventions to the Military Committee. We never pretend to deal with them, and do not.

Mr. SEWELL. I refer to appropriations for new items, like guns, ammunition, etc., and new inventions. Such provisions get into the Army appropriation bill, and the Committee on Appropriations do not take up those questions from the standpoint from which I speak. The military bills contain a variety of technical questions which can better be administered upon by the Military Committee than they can possibly be by the Committee on Appropriations.

I do not want in this argument to reflect at all upon the Committee on Appropriations, for, as I say, I have the highest regard for them and for their labors, but I do hope particularly that this bill will go to the committee that ought, in my opinion, to have it.

Mr. QUAY. I believe the resolution is still open to amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution is open to amendment. The Senator from New Jersey, the Chair understands, withdraws his amendment.

Mr. SEWELL. I do not intend to press it at the present time.

Mr. QUAY. Then I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to add:

All appropriations relating to the construction, purchase, or maintenance of public buildings and grounds shall be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The Committee on Finance shall consist of 15 members.

Mr. QUAY. The first amendment is in line with the general thought of the resolution of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], and I hope he will accept it. The proposition is that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds shall report a bill covering appropriations for public buildings and grounds.

Mr. DUBOIS. Of course I will not accept the amendment. As I understand it, it is not in line with my proposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no such appropriation bill.

Mr. QUAY. Then, I do not understand the Senator's proposition. I supposed the underlying theory of the resolution to be that the different appropriation bills were to be committed to those committees that were naturally most conversant with the subjects committed to them. That, it seems, is not the thought of the Senator from Idaho.

As to the other amendment, I will say that in allotting places upon the committees to the different members of the Senate upon both sides of the Chamber, I think very different allotments would have been made had it been understood at the time that the resolution of the Senator from Idaho was to be pressed to a conclusion, and if it is passed the committees at the proper time should be recast. I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations. It was not my special desire to go upon that committee, and I certainly would not have gone there had I known that this resolution was to have been passed.

On the Committee on Finance there are thirteen members; it was increased either two or four at the beginning of the session; but the fact remains that, as at present constituted, when a great revenue bill is to be introduced and perfected in the interests particularly of agriculture and manufactures, in the next Congress the great Middle States—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware—with all their tremendous agricultural, manufacturing, corporate, and financial interests will be without representation. I simply desire that the Committee on Finance shall be increased so that one of those States and the great interests involved shall have a representative on that committee when legislation is being prepared so vital to the welfare of all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] said yesterday, when I was a member of the other branch of Congress I voted to distribute the appropriation bills, so that I am not at all embarrassed in the position I hold in this body on that question. I believe it is in the line of better legislation, in the direction of expediting the business of Congress, and that there is no danger that the Senate will be any more extravagant under an arrangement of that kind than it has been in the past.

I listened with great interest to the remarks of my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], in which he suggested that he would not voluntarily have taken membership on the Committee on Appropriations if he had known that this resolution was to be pressed. This resolution was on the Calendar of the Senate at that time, and it was perfectly well understood, I think, that it was to be taken up for consideration; and I want to give notice now, Mr. President, that if any member of the Committee on Appropriations desires to retire, I will with great pleasure fill that vacancy if the Senate shall choose to elect me to it. So there will be no difficulty on that score. [Laughter.]

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. I will say if the amendment I offered increasing the number of the Committee on Finance does pass and I can be placed there, the Senator from New Hampshire can have the vacancy on the Committee on Appropriations. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. We shall try to adjust that later on.

I think there have been some misapprehensions and some misstatements, through inadvertence, during this debate. Even the distinguished Senator from Ohio yesterday—and I am under obligations to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] for some facts touching this matter—even, I say, the distinguished Senator from Ohio was in error in thinking that the general appropriations for the Departments would be taken from the Committee on Appropriations under the resolution. The appropriations for the State, Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, and Post-Office Departments, and that for the Department of Justice, are on the legislative bill and are not affected by the proposed change.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. What the Senator from Ohio meant when he spoke of the departmental appropriations was not the appropriations for the clerical force in the Departments, but the general appropriations for the work of the Departments. I thought at the time he used the word it might be considered as only referring to the minor appropriations for the payment of the clerical force, which, of course, are in the legislative appropriation bill; but the Senator from Ohio meant to refer to the whole general appropriations for the Departments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I propose to add to that statement the further fact that the Army bill and the Navy bill are not Department bills, but carry only the military and naval establishments, pay of the officers and men, transportation, purchase of supplies, material, etc. There is much in both of these bills, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] has just suggested, that is technical in character, and it seems to me that they should go to the Military and Naval Committees. So far as the pay of the Army and Navy is concerned, it seems of little consequence where it goes, as it is all fixed by law; to pass upon it is a mere perfunctory matter.

This measure is a conservative one in the larger sense. No surer means can be taken to preserve the conservatism of this body than to make it in fact what it is in theory—a Senate of equals, and therefore the duties and responsibilities should be divided as equally as possible. Nothing tends so much to make men conservative as to put responsibility upon them. It is not safe, wise, or just to place the responsibility for legislation in a few hands or to put all the wisdom and conservatism on a few committees. It is the truer principle to make all the committees conservative by giving them the duties and responsibilities that properly pertain to the subject-matter they have in charge. Not only the responsibility, but the equality of duties and honors tends also to conservatism. No community or body of men can be less liable to radicalism and innovation than one of substantial equality. Where every man sees that he is as well situated as every other man there is the least possible temptation to seek for change.

With the proposed distribution minor committees will become important and desirable. Some of the older Senators will stay on them, and there will be a greater sprinkling of new men on what are now leading committees, and in this way the new element, to which I belong, will be under proper influence and instruction. The present method is not a true principle, and that it has given so little trouble is due to the special ability of the committee, but it is not wise to calculate on always having a committee of much more than ordinary capacity. The system should be framed to fit ordinary conditions. The objectionable features of the present system will become more and more apparent with the growth of the country and the necessary increase of appropriations. The work of that committee is now crowded into a short time, and the necessity for haste increases the danger of mistakes. It also affords a greater opportunity for the persistent applicant. The hearings must be very brief, and the committee has not time for careful investigation. The committee will have quite enough to do, more I think than any other committee of the Senate, certainly much more than the average, to give proper attention to the bills remaining in their hands. The last sundry civil bill alone carried 381 different and independent appropriations, none of them fixed by law and all requiring separate investigation. The items are distributed all over the country and are of infinite variety and character. The pension bill now upon the Calender, the largest in dollars of all the appropriation bills, carries only eight items, and the last Post-Office bill, the next largest in point of appropriation, carried only forty-two items.

I have taken occasion to make an examination of the different items in the various appropriation bills, which I desire to present as a contribution to this discussion. The number of items is as follows:

Agricultural appropriation act	50
Army appropriation act	60
Diplomatic and consular	36
District of Columbia	160
Fortifications	35
Indian appropriation act	156
Legislative, executive, and judicial	359
Military Academy	139
Naval appropriation act	83
Pension	8
Post-Office	42
Sundry civil appropriation act	381
Deficiency appropriation	402

So, Mr. President, if the resolution as proposed is adopted in its entirety and without amendment, there will still remain in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations appropriation bills covering 1,142 separate items, and in all the bills that will be distributed to the other committees of the Senate there will be only 769 items.

It seems to me, in view of this fact, Mr. President, that we are not dismantling the Committee on Appropriations, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] termed it yesterday. We are still leaving in their hands almost twice as much in the matter of appropriations as we are distributing to all the other committees of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has quite ingeniously arrayed the number of items and clauses contained in the appropriation bills. Does he not know that in the general bills he proposes alone to leave to the Committee on Appropriations almost all these items are little items fixed by law? Every item that carries a clerk's salary of $1,200 or $1,500 a year is fixed by law, and nobody can change it. Their consideration requires no time, and those items go to make up the 1,142 items to which the Senator refers.

I should like the Senator to tell the Senate, on this important question of the expenditure of the public money and the appropriations, how the aggregate of the three appropriation bills he proposes to leave to the Committee on Appropriations compares with the rest of the appropriation bills? If he does not know, I can tell him that the bills he proposes to leave to the Committee on Appropriations, made up of these little items, aggregate something less than $70,000,000, while the great balance of the appropriations, running up to $300,000,000, are to be taken away from that committee and given to the several committees named. The itemized consideration the Senator is referring to does not in any way measure the responsibility of the committee's action. The Committee on Appropriations, aside from the sundry civil bill, can consider the legislative appropriation bill, and it is one of the shortest bills under consideration in the Senate, and little time is needed to be devoted to it. It is only a schedule of salaries. The deficiency items, four hundred and odd, are almost all of them made up of single estimates of small amounts made to the Committee on Appropriations by the Departments. I have had charge of deficiency bills with 500 items in them which did not carry in all over five or six million dollars, while a single bill, to be considered in all its importance in relation to other bills that are to be sent to these other committees, has on it forty or sixty or seventy or one hundred and forty million dollars. The Senator ought not to stick in the bark in his reasoning, and to conclude, or to ask the Senate to conclude, that this matter is of importance according to the number of items. He might as well say that one work by one author is of more importance than that by another because it has more lines.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator can make his speech in his own time.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to take up the Senator's time.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is equally as ingenious as he gives me credit for having been. I open this book of appropriations of the last Congress, and on a single page I find one item of $900,000, another of $425,000, another of $240,000, and another of $200,000, which come under the purview of the Committee on Appropriations.

The Senator does not do himself justice, so far as his ordinary practice is concerned, in not stating that one single bill, which only carries eight appropriations, and that the pension appropriation bill—to which his committee is welcome, so far as I am concerned, if they prefer to have charge of it—carries $140,000,000 concerning which there can be no controversy, because it is estimated by the Commissioner of Pensions, and we have to appropriate for it whether we will or not.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a suggestion in that line?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Maine spoke of the fact that the several items might be simply for the salaries of clerks, the amount for which the committee would be obliged to insert in the bill because the salary was fixed by law. I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that the committee can change the salaries in an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. The committee can not. The Senator is not familiar with the rules or he would not make that assertion. The committee has no right to change salaries, and it is absolutely precluded from doing so by a rule of the Senate.

Mr. HILL. The committee can change salaries.

Mr. HALE. The committee can not.

Mr. HILL. It has been done over and over again.

Mr. HALE. It has been done, then, by unanimous consent.

Mr. HILL. That is the way most of the business of the Senate is done, by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. I know many things have been done by unanimous consent. Senators have a wrong idea of the scope and purview of the Committee on Appropriations. The committee can not change salaries. Sometimes it has been attempted, but the person whose salary was so reduced has recovered the difference afterwards.

Mr. GALLINGER. Touching upon the matter of salaries, it is a notorious fact that appropriation bills do change salaries.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. They grant a thousand dollars a year more to one officer, perhaps, than is provided for by the statutes of the United States. They have reduced salaries all along the line to my personal knowledge, because I have been in contests in Congress with a view to increasing those salaries to the point provided by law, by solemn enactment of the Congress of the United States. There is no question but that salaries are frequently changed. Some are increased in value and others are reduced in value by the appropriation bills passed by Congress.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator know of an instance of the Senate Committee on Appropriations reducing salaries?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not say the Senate committee did it. I say committees of Congress.

Mr. HALE. We are dealing with the jurisdiction of the Senate committee now.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would be competent to increase salaries where the House of Representatives had reduced them, or vice versa.

Mr. HALE. During my service as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I do not recollect a case where the committee reduced salaries.

Mr. GALLINGER. The fact is notorious that it has been done upon appropriation bills that have become laws, and the cases are so numerous as certainly not to have escaped the attention of Senators.

Mr. HILL. I ask whether the salary of the minister to Mexico was not increased on an appropriation bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. And the Commissioner of Pensions, if I recollect correctly, receives a thousand dollars more per year than is provided by law. I have been always glad to vote for it, but it is not competent to question the fact that the salaries are changed, some increased and some reduced, in almost every appropriation bill that comes before Congress.

I have but a single word more to say. I have no feeling about this matter. If this resolution goes through, the bill in the next Congress providing for appropriations covering the estimates of the Pension Bureau will probably go to the committee of which I now chance to be chairman. I may not then be a member of that committee or of this body, so that I have no personal interest in the matter, and no desire to have this change made from any personal considerations. But some matters have come to my attention that have influenced me in taking the position I have, and I do it in entire good nature and with kindly feeling toward the Committee on Appropriations, every member of which, I trust, is my friend, the great ability of the membership of that committee being recognized to no greater extent by any other member of this body than by myself.

In the last Congress it became my duty to secure legislation overruling a matter that became a law of Congress on an appropriation bill. A certain class of pensioners of the United States who chanced to be resident temporarily or otherwise in foreign countries were denied their pensions, and it was done by the insertion of a clause on an appropriation bill. A poor old woman, whose husband had died in Andersonville, wrote me from Ireland, saying that she had been receiving $12 a month, and that her pension was denied her by the Government of the United States. I thought it was an outrage, and I took steps to have the statute corrected, and it was corrected, and those people are just as much entitled to pensions as any others.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Was that provision put on at the instance of the Senate committee?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know whether it was or not; but it was on an appropriation bill.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator ought to know before he charges it on the Committee on Appropriations. As I understand, it was put on in the other House.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am making no charge against any committee or any member of a committee. The Senate Committee on Appropriations could have eliminated that from the appropriation bill. There is no question about that. The Senator from Colorado will not put me in the position of unkindly or unjustly criticising the Committee on Appropriations on this subject. I propose to do nothing of the kind.

Mr. TELLER. My recollection of that provision is that it came from the House Committee on Pensions and was put on the pension appropriation bill there.

Mr. GALLINGER. The House Committee on Pensions has not charge of the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. TELLER. But it was suggested by and came from the Pension Committee of the House, which was hostile, perhaps, to some extent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suppose the Senator means the Invalid Pension Committee. In the House there are two Pension Committees.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know what it is called there. The provision did not come from the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not charging that it came from the Senate. I simply say it was legislation on an appropriation bill, and it was an outrage.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly. I will yield to any Senator for any reasonable question.

Mr. HALE. The question I want to ask is this: The Senator has just said he was simply charging that legislation got on appropriation bills coming from somewhere. I ask the Senator, then—and I know he will give me a candid answer—does he think if the pension appropriation bill should be committed to the Pension Committee that there would be less legislation upon it than there is now or more?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will be candid with the Senator in making my reply, and say that possibly there might be more, but it would be fair legislation. It would not be legislation robbing the widows of men who lost their lives in defense of their country of the paltry pensions they were receiving. The Pension Committee would see that no such legislation as that should become a law if they could prevent it, I can assure the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Then the complaint that the Committee on Appropriations puts legislative items on the appropriation bills falls, and it is only said that other committees in putting on legislation might put on more, but would put on what they thought was right. It is a fact that to the present pension appropriation bill there were three separate and distinctive changes of the law proposed by the Committee on Pensions. The Appropriations Committee considered that those were matters that the Pension Committee should deal with; that, strictly speaking, it ought to report separate bills covering those items, and not load the appropriation bills with them. I have no doubt, if the pension appropriation bill goes to the Senator's committee, that every item of pension legislation that is sought to be enacted will be put upon the pension appropriation bill, upon the theory that an appropriation bill will go through and the legislation will remain on it, and that in that way new legislation will be railroaded through.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator does the Committee on Pensions gross injustice in making that statement. I take it that the Committee on Pensions is composed of equally as honorable and sensible men as any other committee of this body.

Mr. HALE. It certainly is.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the Senator misstates the fact when he says that the Committee on Pensions recommended three distinct items of legislation on the pension appropriation bill. They did nothing of the kind. The Committee on Pensions has taken no action on any item, so far as recommending that it should go on the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to conclude this sentence. I will say to the Senator from Maine that I was very courteously invited, in my individual capacity, to appear before the Committee on Appropriations by the distinguished chairman of that committee. I put before them three propositions, and submitted them to that committee, stating that if they saw their way clear to put them on the bill, I thought they would be in the interests of good legislation. The chairman of the committee I know will say, if he says anything, that I did not urge them upon that committee, and did not say that I thought the committee ought to put them on.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly I was mistaken in saying that they had the formal indorsement of the Pension Committee. On reflection, aside from the testimony of the Senator from New Hampshire, I do not think they had that formal indorsement, but they came to the committee through the channel of the Senate, and, it was understood, represented the views of the Senator from New Hampshire, who is the chairman and the organ of that committee, and they had the same force that they would have had if the committee itself had reported them and sent them to the Senate. I do not think the record in any way shows that the committee itself did that.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a new proposition that the individual act of a Senator binds the committee of which he chances to be chairman. Those amendments did not even go through the regular channel of the Senate. They were taken to the committee in my hand. They never were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator any doubt that his committee is in favor of them?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not sure whether it is or not. The amendments have never been submitted to the committee.

Mr. HALE. They were considered by our committee as representing through the chairman its expression, and we supposed that if they were not reported on the bill the Senator, as chairman of the committee, would move them as amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. It may be possible that I will do so. I shall exercise my rights under the rules of this body to do about that what I think is proper. If the amendments do not get the concurrence of a majority of this body, of course they will not go on the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say a word, if the Senator from New Hampshire will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am pleased to yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. With respect to those amendments I will state that the attention of the Committee on Appropriations was called to them because they had been offered and considered in the other House. I called upon the chairman of the Committee on Pensions and asked him kindly to examine them and express his opinion to our committee respecting the utility or importance of inserting them in the bill. He subsequently stated to me that he had examined them and that he would put the amendments in form, in order that we might have them in hand should we consider it wise to consider them afterwards.

Having done that, I called the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to those amendments as respects their merits and the propriety of yielding to the Committee on Pensions if they desired to offer them. I believe that some of those provisions are wise and ought to be inserted, perhaps, in some bill at this session. So I acquit the Senator from New Hampshire of any special desire about the matter. I think I am as much involved in it as he is, and perhaps a little more, because I called his attention to it.

I wish to say a few words more, if the Senator from New Hampshire will yield for a moment further.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. The provision on the pension appropriation act of some years ago which excluded persons residing abroad from the benefit of the pensions allotted to them was inserted in the House of Representatives and was upon the bill when it appeared in the Senate. It was discussed in the Committee on Appropriations, and there was a divided opinion there respecting it, a majority, I think, believing that the provision should stand as it appeared in the bill when it came from the House. I have not had time just now to examine into the question as to whether it was stricken out. I remember very well that it was debated in this body, and of course every Senator who was present when the bill was considered must have known of its provisions.

Having been in force a year or two, this body, I believe, unanimously voted to repeal it, perhaps on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire. Of that I am not sure, however. But it was found to work an injustice to worthy people who resided abroad; and they not only have received pensions for the current years, but they have been paid the pensions of which they were deprived by that legislation. So I am sure that that should not be an argument pro or con respecting any matter now under consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have but an added word to contribute to this discussion, having said more than I intended to say when I rose, and that is to reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the Committee on Pensions, and we take this as an illustration, would load down the appropriation bill with new legislation.

I think I am not mistaken when I say that the Senator from Maine is always watchful of legislation in this body, and especially of appropriation bills, and any new legislation that that committee might propose on the pension appropriation bill would be obnoxious to a point of order, and the committee could not control the matter in the least degree. So I think that suggestion falls of its own weight and ought not to influence any Senator either in his opinion on this question or in the casting of his vote.

I believe that a division of appropriation bills, a division of responsibility, should be made in the Senate. I am sure that it will conduce to a better feeling, that it will satisfy to a much larger degree than heretofore the membership of this body, and that the controversy that is raging over this matter to-day will, in the light of subsequent events, be seen to involve a proposition that is dictated by every consideration of good legislation, by every consideration of fair play, and by every consideration of good sense, so far as this body is concerned.

That is all I care to say about the matter. I shall be content whatever the decision of the Senate may be. If the Committee on Appropriations desire to retain the appropriation bill which will come to the committee of which I am chairman, provided this resolution is adopted, they have only to make a request of me and, so far as I am concerned, I shall be very glad to place it in their hands, with its one hundred and forty-odd million dollars, thus swelling the amount that will go to the regular Committee on Appropriations far beyond that which will be distributed to all the other committees of the Senate. That, perhaps, would satisfy the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who dwelt with so much emphasis upon the fact that the Committee on Appropriations, under the provisions of the resolution, will be intrusted with a less amount of appropriations than properly belongs to them.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I wish to add a word to the discussion just at this point. Perhaps what I have to say will come in more appropriately in connection with the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] who has just taken his seat than at any other time.

My attention was first called to what seemed to me a strange condition in the Senate in the matter of our referring appropriation bills to one committee; and the circumstance I shall state. I will relate an instance of my own. Once when we were considering the District appropriation bill we came to an item of labor for certain employees of the District of Columbia who were then receiving but $25 per month. I felt anxious that their salaries should be increased so as to correspond with the character of the work they were doing, and I proposed an amendment of that character.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for a moment when it suits his convenience?

Mr. PEFFER. I will yield now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to correct the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. They both stated that the provision on the pension appropriation bill to which I alluded came from the House of Representatives. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that it was inserted by the Senate committee as an amendment to the appropriation bill as it came from the House.

Mr. PEFFER. I proposed an amendment to the bill to increase the salaries of those employees of the District of Columbia, and a point of order was made against it that my proposed amendment had not been considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

During the progress of the discussion on that bill I found a number of other cases like mine. That is the constant practice during the consideration of appropriation bills, and points of order are made upon Senators for the reason that their proposed amendments have not been considered by the appropriate committee. The force of this suggestion lies in the fact that it is expected that all of these different matters, where it is proposed to amend an appropriation bill, shall be referred to the appropriate committee. That being true, why would it not be better to refer the whole bill in the beginning to the appropriate committee?

Take the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia. How easy, how natural, how simple, how appropriate in every way it would be for any Senator to go directly to that committee at any time before the bill is reported and in person submit his wish, whatever it may be, to the committee. It would save a great deal of trouble and a great deal of inconvenience and annoyance, as well as difficulty, when the bill gets into the Senate.

I only wish to add, in this rambling way, that the point I desire to present to the Senate now is that if in the matter of submitting amendments we are expected to refer our amendments first to the appropriate committee, it seems to me it would be better to refer the whole subject in the beginning to the appropriate committee; for that reason I am in favor of the resolution.

Mr. DANIEL obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to correct the statement I just made. By inadvertence I got possession of a copy of the wrong bill, and I will state that undoubtedly the statement made by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Colorado was correct in regard to the matter of legislation on the appropriation bill to which I referred in my remarks.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Virginia will yield to me long enough to say a word.

Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate reported an amendment repealing that provision.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, it has been well said by a leading writer on finance that the fisc is the state. When a committee of thirteen is charged by a large legislative body with the distribution of $400,000,000, involving all the departments of Government and the fiscal affairs of 70,000,000 people, it can hardly be doubted that such a committee of this body is almost, if not quite, the Senate. Modern legislation has been called government by committees. It is necessarily so. The affairs of modern life move so rapidly, are so correlated and complicated, population has so increased that ex necessitate what is done by a committee is in nine cases out of ten determinative of the question.

Most heartily, Mr. President, do I approve of the resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS]. It involves, in my judgment, an important, a most excellent legislative reform. I regretted to hear the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] refer to the proposition as a censure upon the committee, of which he is so useful and so honored a member. He does injustice to himself by that remark. He does injustice to his committee and to its able, faithful, and accomplished chairman by that remark. He does equal injustice to his colleagues, who have not the slightest desire to reflect upon any of the gentlemen who compose that committee, but who, upon the contrary, regard them, one and all, with the greatest respect. But because they regard this committee of thirteen with that respect which is due their character, their public services, and the ability they have demonstrated upon this floor is no reason why they should not also regard with respect the whole body of which they are members and diffuse that respect with equal confidence among those who are the peers of the gentlemen of this thirteen committee.

Mr. President, this movement is an evolution as necessary and as inevitable as almost any of the evolutions in the change of rules of modern legislative bodies. When there were only 13 States in the Union a committee of this size would have had a member from each State, and every section would have been properly and fully represented in the distribution of the money of the people. Taxation and representation must go together, according to the very bedrock definition of republican government. Taxation and representation are divorced from each other when a few men distribute its proceeds and the many are given but little voice therein.

Fourteen general appropriation bills come before this body, and they involve in the aggregate nearly $400,000,000 of public money. There is more than one general appropriation bill for each gentleman on the Committee on Appropriations. In the nature of man, in the limitations of his physical and mental being, it is utterly impossible, it never has been and it never can be, that 13 men, however wise, however gifted, or however diligent, can sift thoroughly the enormous body of fiscal literature that is dumped upon them in the closing months of a legislative session To attempt to do it would be to organize failure. Nor do I imagine that it is attempted. The Senators who constitute that committee are gentlemen of too mature intellect, of too enlarged experience, to attempt it. Out of the necessity of the case the 14 appropriation bills must be divided up and handed over to subcommittees of one or two or three, and the ultima ratio of the system is that two or three gentlemen, a subcommittee, give the cast and character to the measures that come before the committee and the Senate, which it is almost impossible greatly to modify or to change afterwards.

The gentlemen who constitute the Appropriations Committee are Senators of such service, of such experience, and of such leading character in this body that we can not afford to dispense with their services altogether from other departments than those which involve appropriations. If you will look at the list of committees you will observe, for instance, that the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is second upon the Committee on Appropriations, is also second on the Naval Affairs Committee and is chairman of the Committee on Printing. In either one of the departments of the administration of this body outside of appropriations he would have enough in other committee duties to absorb the intellect of any well-equipped statesman. Therefore, sir, he must surrender his attention to some one or all these appropriation bills, and to whom can he better surrender them than to the committees of this body, constituted of gentlemen who, like himself, represent equal States and entitled to have an equal voice in the distribution of the public money?

Mr. President, it goes without saying that it is fairer to the body to give, as far as may be within the limits of possible administration, an equal opportunity to every Senator to pass upon the matter of appropriations. It was well said by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] in his philosophical and logical remarks that it is also appropriate to divide the responsibility. What Senator upon this floor who is not upon the Committee on Appropriations can feel that he is properly chargeable with responsibility for the aggregate appropriations of this body? He has small concern in saying what they shall be, nor can he be permitted to say anything until in the closing days of the session, when there is a perfect ice gorge of measures contending for precedence before this body and when the Appropriations Committee comes in and is accorded precedence and dominates the whole theater of legislative action.

Mr. President, I do not care to detain the Senate longer. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] yesterday said that he hoped we would settle this question now. I say amen to that proposition. I hope it may be settled to-day. I believe the great majority of this body feel that this proposed change is in the interest of the fair and unsectional administration of the public business. Let me point out one single fact in respect to the Committee on Appropriations. There is not a single Senator from the Maryland line to the Rio Grande upon the Appropriations Committee. There is not a single Senator from a cotton State—Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas—upon the Committee on Appropriations. An immense empire of this Union, deeply concerned in all of these fiscal matters, and in the distribution of $400,000,000, has not a hand in the Senate to assist, from the local standpoint, in shaping them.

Mr. GRAY. Is not the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] upon the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir; but Florida is not in the region I mentioned. The distinguished Senator from Florida represents a region entirely distinctive in its geographical relation and in the nature of its products. It is not a cotton State. It is as separate and distinct from the great region of country that stretches from the Potomac to the Rio Grande as would be one of the New England States, because it is a State that juts out into the Gulf of Mexico and is almost in the tropics.

Mr. President, I shall vote for the pending resolution, I repeat, not in any reflection upon my honored and distinguished colleagues, but Senators here can not feel that they ought to be held, or that they fairly are responsible for fiscal legislation as long as they are outsiders to that legislation, and have not the fair and full opportunity to participate in a just share of molding it.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, before we make this change in the rules I think we ought properly to understand what the rules exactly are, and what are the functions of the different committees. I know of nothing now that prevents any committee of this body from formulating a general appropriation bill. What reason is there why the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry may not now report a bill to this body embodying all the expenditures for agricultural purposes without the proposed change? Why is not this also true of the Military Committee, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the other committees, unless you construe the language of the existing rule "all general appropriations" to mean that a bill introduced here relating to appropriations for the Department of Agriculture must go not to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, but to the Committee on Appropriations? Such has not been the construction of the rule. This rule refers to the appropriations coming from the other House. The general appropriation bills that come here are referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Why? Because the committees having charge of agricultural expenses, of military expenses, of naval expenses in the House of Representatives have already considered, in the course of their business, all the items of appropriations that come to the Committee on Appropriations, except those referred to by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], which are permanent in their nature and fixed in the law. That is the theory of the reference of the appropriations to the Committee on Appropriations and is the reason why they are referred in the Senate to one committee. Is there any particular function now conferred upon that committee except to gather together the total amount of the appropriation in the different bills in order that the total amount of appropriations may be confined within the revenue of the Government and some supervision be had over the entire amount of appropriations?

Now, that is nothing more than a summing up of the total appropriations made in any one Congress by the two Houses, coming to us for final decision. Is that a function to be safely dispensed with? Is it a useless one, that some committee of this body shall be charged with ascertaining before it shall become a law that the total amount of the appropriations are within the revenues of the Government and adequate to their purpose? It seems to me that this is a function that can not be safely dispensed with in any legislative body.

As to the idea that the Committee on Appropriations are charged with the entire business of Congress, if it be so, amend your rules in that respect and change the power of that committee so that it will not be enabled to exercise the functions of any other committee. But, Mr. President, if that be so, it is because the different committees of this body charged specially with the consideration of the expenditures of the several Departments, as of naval affairs, and military affairs, and judicial affairs, have failed to examine into the subject and perform the duties belonging to them. They have the power and are constituted to supervise, appropriate for, and conduct all the business relating to those committees; and this amendment will do no more, when it shall have been passed, than confer upon them that authority and dispense with any final examination of the total amount of appropriations. That is all the function it will have.

I sympathize entirely with the idea, and have repeatedly so stated in the Senate, that every member of this body should have an equal and fair connection with the important business of this body. I sympathize with the idea that the apportionment of business among the committees and the number of Senators on the important committees are not what they might be and what they should be; but are you improving that condition when you confine to a small number of this body, a few here and there, and upon one committee, the entire recommendations and supervision of the appropriations for the subjects belonging to that committee? Is it not true that the Committee on Pensions, for instance, being particularly interested in the subject of pensions, should have some other committee to examine the appropriations for pensions amounting to $140,000,000? Is it not true that the Committee on Naval Affairs, being particularly interested and prejudiced in favor of expenditures of that class, should have its appropriation of money submitted to some other committee before it becomes a law, to supervise its judgment in these matters? Is it not true of each of the committees that its members naturally become especially and unduly interested in appropriations relating to matters referred to that committee?

Shall we then refuse in the appropriations of this vast amount of money to have a separate committee to ascertain that when these different committees, which now have plenary authority to pass bills and appropriate money to any extent they see fit, the Senate sanctioning it, that before that is done their judgment should be supervised by some other committee? If you choose, make it as large as you please, and let every State have a member upon it; but that function should not be entirely taken away; and that the work of these committees should not be final and undergo no kind of examination by some committee which has to report to this body and bring to their attention the fact that these different committees have appropriated a sum of money greater than the revenues of the Government or inadequate to its necessary uses is a fact that ought not to be entirely disregarded. Each committee comes here with its appropriation bill and appropriates a specific amount of money. Another committee certainly ought to collect all these bills and report on their aggregate amount, with such recommendations as may be proper.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Has not the Committee on Appropriations, as now organized, been reporting more appropriations than the amount of the revenues of the Government for several years?

Mr. CALL. That is a question that has nothing to do with what I am talking about. It has nothing to do with the organization of committees.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator says he is opposed to the other system because they may do it. Your committee, I understand, has already done it.

Mr. CALL. I will answer the Senator by saying that whatever may be the revenues of the Government in late years, owing to the public policy, is not a question now to be considered in this connection.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator brought it in.

Mr. CALL. Not for that purpose. There has been a deficiency in the appropriations every year of from $8,000,000 to $13,000,000. Even when the Senate has increased the House appropriations, as it has been obliged to do because of the necessities of the public service, every year there has been a deficiency of from $8,000,000 to $13,000,000 in the amount required to meet the expenses of the Government under existing law.

There has been a great deal of talk here about the action of the other House, and whether the action of the House in distributing the appropriation bills had increased appropriations or not. It has increased appropriations, and notwithstanding that, when a bill comes to the Senate and the public service requires an enlargement of these appropriations, a deficiency every year of from $8,000,000 to $13,000,000 has been reported, and deficiency bills passed. So it will be seen to be very apparent that even with the existing system of massing the appropriations and bringing them to the attention of Congress there has been a failure to meet the exigencies of the public service. And how much greater will it be when there is no consideration of that point whatever?

If we want to reform the service of the Senate, let it not be done by giving to a junta—three or four upon the Committee on Agriculture, or the Committee on Indian Affairs, or the Committee on Military Affairs, or, say, seven out of the largest committees—of seven persons to go through the whole subject of the appropriations for the department to which the work of that committee relates. Let us increase the important committees of this body, if you choose to refer appropriation bills to them when introduced in the Senate or coming from the other House. As I said, it is now perfectly competent for the Senator from Virginia upon the Committee on Foreign Relations to report a bill covering every item of possible expenditure in that department, and so it is of the Committee on Finance, and of every other committee of this body. It can now, under existing law and the construction of the rules, report bills covering all the items of appropriations to be made for the subjects committed to that committee.

But if you are going to amend the rule, let it be so amended that when these bills have been passed upon by the special committees, having undergone their examination, they shall come to some committee of this body, a new one if you choose, but that somewhere there shall be a function that shall say the total amount of the bill for agriculture, of the bill for naval affairs, for military affairs, for diplomatic affairs, or judicial expenses is either in excess of the revenue or inadequate to these expenditures, and let that matter be brought to the notice of the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. Let me ask the Senator from Florida a question. Does not every Senator see that statement in the estimates of the Department, and can not the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, go through that revision?

Mr. CALL. I heartily agree with the Senator that we had better wipe out all these committees. I do not agree in the government of committees. I think the English Parliament, that transacts its business in committee of the whole, is far better for legislation. But if you are to have committees and are to commit the judicial expenses to a few, and the diplomatic expenses to a half dozen Senators, and the naval affairs, and so on, let there be some function somewhere in this body that shall say the whole of these bills amount to such a sum, either above or below the revenues of the Government. That is what the Committee on Appropriations was created for. It was to take the total amount of the appropriations and to show to the Senate where they should be diminished and where increased. For what purpose? That they might be within the revenues of the Government, and for that purpose alone. And that, on the other hand, they may be adequate to the necessary expenses of the Government.

Objection has been made to the manner in which points of order are raised by that committee. Amend your rules, but let it not be that nowhere, if you are to have committees in this body, shall there be a committee—a regular committee—and the Senators on it responsible to ascertain what is the total amount of the appropriations made by these several committees. But the resolution of the Senator from Idaho and the observations of the Senator from Virginia require that each committee shall report the appropriation bill, and the bill shall become a law when so reported, because these committees are the body that will act finally upon the appropriation bills in committee of conference. All these committees will then have their appropriations perfected without any inquiry by this body as to the total amount of the appropriations, and it can not but be otherwise, since each committee must report separately, and each bill must be considered separately and become a law separately.

The resolution of the Senator from Idaho as it stands requires that not more than seven men upon each of these committees shall finally recommend, and that the same point of order and the same absolute processes shall exist as to the appropriations by the different committees, and that there shall be no understanding on the part of this body until the last bill shall be passed as to what has been appropriated and what are their relations to the revenues of the Government.

For that reason, Mr. President, I shall offer, when the proper time comes, the amendment which I have before me here.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, just a moment. I do not intend to restate the reasons urged yesterday why the resolution of the Senator from Idaho should be passed. I simply desire to reply briefly to the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. It is not the first time that I have differed from him in regard to a question of parliamentary law. I recollect a short time since when I introduced a resolution I was immediately met with an objection by the Senator from Maine that it was absolutely out of order. I asked him to point out the rule. He said he would point it out. It has not yet been pointed out. He asserted to-day that the Committee on Appropriations has had no power to increase the salary of any official of the Government. I ask now what rule prevents it. I assert the contrary to be the case. I assert that the Committee on Appropriations has the power to increase the salary of any official of the Government except those whose compensation is fixed by the Constitution, if there is any such provision in the Constitution.

Mr. HARRIS. It has the power?

Mr. HILL. I mean the power to report, and that it can not be knocked out upon any technicality. That is the point I make. I hold in my hand an appropriation which increased the salary, among others, of our minister to Mexico. I hold in my hand further the report of a conference committee showing that the salary of the financial clerk of this body was increased $500 by the conferees of the two Houses. Gentlemen say it was done by unanimous consent. Unanimous consent has a great deal to answer for in the Senate, but it is not answerable for that. The report is made; the report is carried; there is not any question of unanimous consent about it. It is put to a vote.

I hold in my hand, further, five pages of increases and deductions of salaries. I am not going to detain the Senate by reading it. I am going to adopt the usual course by asking that it be inserted as an appendix to my remarks. It shows that it is the uniform course of the committee to increase or reduce salaries as they see fit.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from New York where those instances are found.

Mr. HILL. In statements of appropriations compiled under the direction of the clerks of the Committees on Appropriations of the two Houses.

Mr. HOAR. Were they proposed by the committee?

Mr. HALE entered the Chamber.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Maine is now here, so it is not necessary for me to interpose any further. However, I ask, were those amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate?

Mr. HILL. Salaries were increased and salaries were diminished.

Mr. HOAR. In what? Who did it? Who made the first proposition for it? Who put it on the bill?

Mr. HILL. Where did it arise?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I do not quite comprehend the Senator's inquiry?

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator will comprehend the force of the inquiry if I state to him the point I had in mind. As I understood the Senator from Maine, he claimed that it was not in order for the Committee on Appropriations, under the rules of this body, to report an amendment to an appropriation bill providing for an increase of salary, on the ground, I suppose, that the permanent salary of an official is general law and that you can not change a general law in that way. Now, it is no answer to that proposition to say that in an appropriation bill brought here from the other House there is found an increase of salary. Undoubtedly the House of Representatives can make any proposition in order that they choose and put it on a bill and send it here. We are limited under our rules in that matter. But I shall not undertake to interfere.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the Senator from Maine if he desires to make a statement.

Mr. HALE. Here is an instance right in point. In the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which is on the table, and which I hope will be taken up when this matter is finished, the House has placed an increase of salary for an officer in the Department of Justice. I suppose the point the Senator from Massachusetts sought to make, and did make, I thought, very clearly, was that when the Senator from New York reads the list of increases of salary where they arose is a matter to be considered, because if the increases of salary did arise in the House, where almost all the bills are in charge of the several committees, that of itself is an argument why the appropriation bills should not be submitted to the several committees of the Senate, who would undoubtedly aggrandize their own Departments. It is not possible——

Mr. HILL. Unquestionably they were regarded as appropriate and proper, because they were sanctioned by the Committee on Appropriations of this body. It does not lie, therefore, in the mouth of the Senator from Maine or that committee to say that the House was the party that erred. It matters not, if they were distinctive appropriations, in which House they originated. Does the Senator mean to say that the Committee on Appropriations has not within even the last two years reported from its committee any item of increase of salary?

Mr. HALE. I said this——

Mr. HILL. That is the question I ask the Senator. Does the Senator say that?

Mr. HALE. No; I will repeat what I said. It is impossible to remember everything. I do not say it can not be found, but I do not recollect an instance where the Senate committee reported increases of salary, and yet it may be possible that in looking over the hundreds of items we have done so. I know that is the rule the Senate committee sticks to, in and out of season, and while it may not have been followed in special cases, that I do not remember. That is the proposition.

Mr. HOAR. Such an amendment would have been liable to a point of order.

Mr. HALE. It would have been liable at any time to a point of order. Now, I will state the trouble about increases, and I suppose the Senator can see it. A committee that has only one Department under its charge, seeking to aggrandize that Department, necessarily will swell its appropriations and increase them. I know myself, from service on other committees, the tendency and inclination. The appropriations for the Agricultural Department have been from year to year swollen and increased almost entirely by the Agricultural Committee of the other House, which has charge of that appropriation bill. It sees nothing but that one Department.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. HILL. And when the question comes to a conference committee members of the Appropriations Committee of this body meet the representatives of the Agricultural Committee of the other House, do they not?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. HILL. If appropriations are proper they should of course be concurred in; there is no question about that. I have not gone through this list to find what particular appropriations originated with the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. When conferees representing the two bodies meet to confer upon any bill, there has to be an adjustment. You can not get all that you want; you have to give up some things. The very object of a conference committee is to confer, to arrange a compromise, to come together, and any committee, whether it be the Appropriations Committee or the several committees referred to, will have to do that. But the thing that will swell appropriations will be the initiative in putting them on appropriation bills, whether in the House or in the Senate. The Senator will find that as certainly as he lives, and it will be worse in the Senate, where the rules are not so strict as they are in the House.

Mr. HILL obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from New York permit me?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine, if he chooses to answer, if he remembers an appropriation bill that ever went out of the Senate carrying as small an amount as it carried when it came to the Senate?

Mr. HALE. That really goes to the bottom of this whole question. The bills from the House are almost always increased, I will not say all, but largely, by the pressure in the Senate against the Committee on Appropriations to put items on that the committee has disagreed to, and that is where the trouble is. That is at the bottom of this whole business, and the fault found with the Committee on Appropriations is that it does not stick in conference to the increases that are put on in the Senate, and there is a feeling that the several committees, if they can get these appropriation bills and can manage them themselves, will stick better than the Senate conferees taken from the Committee on Appropriations do, and will thus get increased appropriations. I want to give an instance. The last naval appropriation bill passed at a time when we were rapidly coming to a condition of almost bankruptcy. It was taken by the Committee on Appropriations. The Naval Committee itself was overruled, and the House overruled, and while we gave a respectable addition to the Navy and continued the desirable work of building it, we did cut down several million dollars, because we did not believe that we could make so large a gun as was proposed. That is not the only case, but that occurs to me at the present time.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from New York, who is entitled to the floor, will permit me a moment, there is that one lone example in our legislation; but I fail to see the pertinency of the argument of the Senator from Maine when he arraigns the Appropriations Committee of the House for extravagance and says it is because the appropriation bills are divided among the several committees, when the fact remains that those very bills which he says are extravagant are almost invariably increased by the Senate.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I shall not follow the Senator in that line of discussion, because I do not intend to argue in regard to the general merits of this controversy. The only point I desired to make when I rose was that salaries are increased by the action of the Appropriations Committee.

I call attention to another argument upon this precise point.

It has been well said that there will be a division of responsibility if this resolution shall pass. There will also be a division of power.

The Appropriations Committee can, of its own volition, increase any appropriation already contained in an appropriation bill, and yet when the bill is reported to the Senate and is under consideration, if a Senator rises in his place and moves to increase an appropriation, he does not stand upon a parity with any member of that committee, or rather with the whole committee. The whole committee can do what the Senate itself can not do, what the whole Senate can not do at that particular time. Then the point is made that the amendment must first have the action of some appropriate committee. I indorse the argument of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER]. We refer the amendment to the particular committee having charge of the general subject-matter for its approval in the first instance, and then refer it to the Appropriations Committee, but the other committee might as well have control of the subject in the first place.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not mean to be wrong, but he is wrong in his statement.

Mr. HILL. I think I am not wrong.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is wrong in the statement that the Appropriations Committee, or any member of it, or all of its members as a body, have any superior right in changing a law over any Senator on the floor. If the Appropriations Committee reports a change of existing law it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. HILL. I am not now speaking of a change of existing law. We have disposed of that question. I am speaking of an increase of appropriations, and I suggest that the Appropriations Committee has greater power over the matter than the whole Senate itself.

Mr. HALE. Would not each committee have the same power if the appropriation bills were distributed?

Mr. HILL. But then the power would be diversified. That is the point. There would be a division not only of responsibility, but of power, which we are seeking here. The doctrine of the Senator from Maine is that the wisdom of a part is greater than the wisdom of the whole Senate. I do not believe it.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from New York and the Senator from Maine allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. It is simply this: It has been ruled from that chair a hundred times or more since I have been a member of this body that the Committee on Appropriations has no more right to increase an item of appropriation in a bill or furnish a new item of appropriation that does not fall within the strict rules of the Senate than has any individual Senator.

Mr. HILL. After the bill is reported to the Senate, that is so.

Mr. HARRIS. Nor is its report exempt from a point of order. I have seen the question of order made upon reports of committees, not only reports of the Committee on Appropriations, but of the various committees of this body, and the Senate itself has never hesitated to rule that the committee as a committee must bring itself within the rule of the body before it can increase or put a new item in an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. Allow me to first ask a question of the Senator from Tennessee. Does the Senator from Tennessee mean to say that when the Committee on Appropriations reports an appropriation bill with a proposed amendment increasing an appropriation that the point of order can be made upon it in the Senate?

Mr. HARRIS. Absolutely, unless the appropriation falls within the rules. which restrict the rights of every Senator upon the floor.

Mr. HILL. There are no rules, Mr. President, to affect it at all. I say there is not a single member of that committee who will question but what they have the right to bring in an appropriation bill, and with it a recommendation for an increase, and a point of order can not be made against it, whereas if any other Senator upon this floor rises in his place and moves an amendment it is subject to the point of order. That is absolutely so.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from New York allow me to make one suggestion? I understand that the report of a committee is nothing more nor less than a motion, and a report of a committee proposing an amendment has no higher or other validity or importance than the same amendment moved by any individual Senator, with the single exception, which is created by the rule, that it shall not be in order for Senators to move a certain class of amendments which have not been previously approved by a committee of the body.

Mr. HALE. Or the estimate of a Department.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; but that is another matter. If the Committee on Appropriations came in here with a unanimous recommendation that an appropriation bill be increased in a certain way or amended in a certain way, that amendment would have exactly the same force, authority, and place in the Senate as if it were the single motion of the Senator from New York or of myself, and no more.

Mr. HILL. Let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts that he is mistaken.

Mr. HALE and Mr. HARRIS. The Senator is not mistaken.

Mr. HILL. I think he is; and for the reason that it then would be claimed that the committee itself had passed upon it, and the Appropriations Committee, being itself a standing committee, its action would have the same effect as if the question had been passed upon by any other committee. Therefore I say, stating my proposition again, that when an ordinary appropriation which comes from the House of Representatives goes to the Appropriations Committee, and the Appropriations Committee simply increase it, not to increase a salary, but to increase something else, it is not subject to the point of order. Does not the Senator agree to that?

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest just what I understand to be the law, and just what is the practice. The Senate Committee on Appropriations, no matter what it reports, and no matter what passes by unanimous consent——

Mr. HILL. Can not the Senator state whether he agrees with the proposition I have just stated?

Mr. HALE. I do not. I agree with the proposition stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and I do not think the Senator from New York quite understands it.

Mr. HILL. The distinguished Senator from Florida on my right [Mr. CALL] says I am right, and I stand by him.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from New York is altogether mistaken. [Laughter.] The Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Massachusetts say exactly the same thing, but the Senator from New York denies it in so many words as soon as he has admitted it.

There is no difference between the Committee on Appropriations or any member of that committee and any other committee of this body in reference to the rules.

Mr. HILL. That is not the question.

Mr. CALL. Yes; that is the question, and that is the only question there is in your whole discussion. The Committee on Appropriations, or the members of that committee, stand precisely in the relation that any other committee or the members of any other committee do in regard to the rules.

Mr. HALE. There is a general idea, Mr. President, that the Committee on Appropriations has the right of itself to increase an appropriation in a bill that comes from the other House. It can only increase such appropriations in two ways. The one must be by an estimate from the head of a Department sent in by the Treasury Department as an estimate, and the other by the approval of a standing committee of the body. That is precisely the situation of an appropriation bill after it is reported here. There is not a single clause that the Committee on Appropriations puts upon these bills which can not be moved by a Senator on the floor under precisely the same rule. That is not generally understood; but that is the scope and the limitation of the Committee on Appropriations. Any Senator may rise in his seat at any time on any provision reported by the Committee on Appropriations and ask if that has the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury as an estimate, or if it has received the sanction of a standing committee of this body; and if it has not, it will fall. That is not generally done, but it is because in the way of doing business here Senators do not interpose, and it goes along, but every right, I assure the Senator, which the Committee on Appropriations has as a body is enjoyed by every Senator on the floor under the rules.

Mr. HILL. I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that the rule does not say that the amendment shall have been recommended by some other committee. The Committee on Appropriations is one of the standing committees of this body. The very fact of reporting the amendment is an adoption of it by one of the standing committees of the body. I ask the Senator's attention further, and ask if he can give a single instance in this body, does he recollect one, where that point of order has ever been made in the Senate against any increase of appropriation? I mean a simple increase, not involving the other question about the increase of salary.

Mr. HALE. I will tell the Senator, and I think he himself will recollect it. The point that the Appropriations Committee may, by adopting an amendment, make it in order because it is a standing committee like any other, has never been settled. There are old Senators here, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and others, who have never assented to that proposition, and it is my belief that in that regard the Committee on Appropriations is on an equality, but no more, with any other committee, and that it has the same power.

Mr. HILL. Then the Senator agrees with me.

Mr. HALE. That question has never been settled in the parliamentary law of the Senate. On the contrary, there have been rulings the other way.

Mr. HILL. When?

Mr. HALE. That the clause must refer when it speaks of an increase of an annual appropriation to the action of some other committee than the Committee on Appropriations. I do not agree to that.

Mr. HILL. I agree now with the Senator from Maine, and I think I have looked up the question a little.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to read the rule?

Mr. HILL. I have the rule before me. I think we are all familiar with it.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator does not seem to be familiar with it.

Mr. HILL. I will allow the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Colorado to fight it out between themselves.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator had taken his seat, and I took the floor. There is no question between us.

Mr. HILL. I nave not finished yet.

There does not seem to be any disagreement about it now. The Senator says the question has not been decided by anybody lately.

Mr. HALE. Not at all.

Mr. HILL. But he is inclined to agree with me that the Appropriations Committee, so far as this question is concerned, stands the same as any other committee when an amendment is reported, and it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. HALE. It has no more right than any other committee. That is what I called attention to.

Mr. HILL. One right at a time. Let us decide that question first.

Mr. HALE. But the Senator and I can not decide that question. Some of the oldest parliamentarians in the body do not quite agree as to what the Senator and I think is right; but admitting that the Committee on Appropriations has only the same right that any other committee has, any Senator on the floor has the right, on the recommendation of any standing committee, when a bill is pending reported from the Appropriations Committee, to move his amendment, and it is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. HILL. We come right back to the point from which we started, namely, that by the change proposed in this resolution there arises a division of power. That is the point involved, and that is the utility of it, that one committee does not have the whole say upon this subject. That is the value of the resolution, that the divers committees can have their say, and we do not have to depend upon one committee.

I simply rose to discuss the question of order, the parliamentary status of the question, and shall not detain the Senate further, because I think we all understand it, with the exception that I desire to add to my remarks a list of the appropriations increasing and reducing the appropriations to which I have referred.

The paper referred to is as follows:

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to state my understanding of this question of parliamentary law in a single sentence only. If the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], being a member of the Judiciary Committee, gets the assent of that committee to a proposed amendment to a bill, which it is in order to move at all, to increase an appropriation, or any other amendment to an appropriation bill, and comes with it on the floor of the Senate, he has the same right to make that motion, and it stands in all respects with the same advantage, even if the whole Committee on Appropriations were opposed to it, as it would if the whole Committee on Appropriations favored it and the chairman of that committee had proposed it as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. Or if it had been put in the bill.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Maine says, "or if it had been put in the bill."

Mr. HALE. As an amendment.

Mr. HOAR. The Committee on Appropriations can not put anything into the bill. The report of the Committee on Appropriations, or any other committee, to a bill in this body, when it comes before the Senate, is simply a series of motions to amend, with no more power or force or weight than if made by individual Senators.

In regard to the matter of the increase of salaries or the diminution of salaries, the provision for the salary of a public officer is in existing law, and therefore, when a committee of this body or an individual Senator is prohibited from moving a change of existing law under its rules, the provision applies equally to that committee from moving increases. They can not, for the same reason, move a diminution of the salary. They may decline to appropriate in any particular year more than half the salary or a quarter of the salary, they may decline to appropriate any part of it; undoubtedly nobody can force them, or the Senate, to put it in. In that case, however, the lawful salary remains, and the lawful claim of the officer remains, and he can go into the Court of Claims and enforce it against the United States, as has more than once been done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The question is upon the adoption of the amendment to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not know exactly what the offense of the Committee on Appropriations may be or what necessity there is for the proposed change. The committee have been charged with some dereliction of duty, it seems to me, by at least two Senators, for allowing certain matters to get into appropriation bills which they should not have done, and in both cases it has appeared that the Committee on Appropriations were not at fault.

It appears that the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] seems to think that the committee has too much power. That is his principal objection. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York if he thinks that the other committees will have any less power when appropriation bills go to them?

Mr. HILL. I have already explained that there would be a division of power. I gave the reasons yesterday, and have given them to-day, why I thought that was appropriate.

Mr. TELLER. The offense that the committee is guilty of, as I understand the Senator from New York, is that they themselves make amendments to appropriation bills. This is the first time that I ever heard that a committee could amend a bill.

Mr. HILL. I hold in my hand several amendments to appropriation bills, made by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, increasing the appropriations.

Mr. TELLER. The committee never in its history made an amendment which was an increase.

Mr. HILL. The Senator, of course, is splitting hairs upon that question. I mean proposing and reporting amendments to bills.

Mr. TELLER. That is a very different thing. Does the Senator from New York, or any other Senator, suppose that the Committee on Military Affairs will not have the same right to propose amendments to bills? If that is a vice of the system, it is not to be corrected by this proposed change. The rules of the Senate are explicit, and nobody need misunderstand them. I propose to call the attention of the Senate now to the rule:

RULE XVI.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

1. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

2. All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are considered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and when actually proposed to the bill, no amendment proposing to increase the amount stated in such amendment shall be received; in like manner amendments proposing new items of appropriation to river and harbor bills shall, before being considered, be referred to the Committee on Commerce; also amendments to bills establishing post-roads, proposing new post-roads, shall, before being considered, be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. President, most of this rule will be in force after the pending resolution shall be adopted, if it be adopted, because all that is proposed to be stricken out by the first amendment is this:

That paragraph 1 of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate be amended by striking out the words "All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce," and inserting the following.

That is what I understand is to be stricken out. The remainder of the rule I have read remains and will be in force. I suppose any little technical differences that may arise may be arranged by an amendment to the rule as it now stands. It is not quite complete.

It is apparent to everybody, I think, who has ever looked into it, that that has been the practice of the Senate, and that the Committee on Appropriations has nothing more than an advisory power. That committee could come here and say to the Senate, "We think these appropriations ought to be increased, unless they fall within the rules which are laid down." I have not had a very extended service on the Committee on Appropriations, and I confess that I am not so very much in love with the committee that it would break my heart if the committee should be dismantled and the appropriation bills should be sent to other committees. I shall get along just as well whether I am on the committee or off of it, so far as that is concerned. But I do not believe that there has been any dereliction on the part of that committee in the many years I have served in the Senate.

I do not know what the complaint is. First it seemed to be that there had been careless and hasty legislation on the part of the committee; but it appears that the only cases complained of had been discussed openly in the House and in the Senate, and it was the action of one body or the other or of both, and the committee had no more responsibility than any member of the Senate.

I heard a very remarkable statement by a Senator who was addressing the Senate upon this subject—that because Senators were not members of the Appropriations Committee they did not have any interest in legislation coming from the committee and did not feel any responsibility for the conduct of affairs which were reported upon from that committee. Will not that be just as true hereafter as it is now? If the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] who made that statement is not a member of the Committee on Military Affairs he will have no more interest or feel no more responsibility when the Committee on Military Affairs reports the Army appropriation bill than he had heretofore when the Committee on Appropriations reported the Army appropriation bill.

Every member of this body can not be placed on one particular committee, nor can one-half of them. One Senator said that there are a great number of States that are not represented on the Committee on Appropriations. That must be true of every committee. It is utterly impossible to so divide and parcel the power of this body that every State will have representation on every committee, or that each State will have a representative on a committee that deals with every great subject. The largest committee of this body has not to exceed 15 members, and that is the Committee on Commerce, I understand. You have 90 members in this body. So there can be nothing in the argument that the Committee on Appropriations does not have a representative from every State.

A Senator suggested that the cotton interest does not have a representative on that committee. The cotton interest certainly does have representation on that committee. There are at least two Senators who reside in the region of country where cotton is raised. Until very recently, at least, it might have been said that some of the greatest industries in the country had no representation on a dozen committees of this body. We have enlarged the committees somewhat, and we have distributed, I think, the power in a little better shape than heretofore; but still it is true that many matters will come before committees on which there are no representatives from the States particularly interested. Take the State of Colorado. It has no representative on the Military Committee; it has no representative on the Public Lands Committee; it has no representative on a great many other committees which consider legislation in which that State is more interested than most of the other States.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It has no representative on the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TELLER. Yes, the Committee on Indian Affairs, for instance, and various others. Every Senator ought to realize that it is absurd to suppose that each State can be represented on a committee, or that it is an offense against a system, or against a committee, to say "Here is a State that has no representative on this committee, and therefore the Senators from that State have no interest in it, and are not responsible." We are responsible for those things that come before the Senate; we are responsible for the legislation of this body, whether it comes from a committee of which we are members, or whether it does not. If it comes from a committee of which we may be members, we know more about it, but our responsibility is the same in either case.

I do not know that during the time I have been a member of the Senate there has been any just cause of complaint against the Committee on Appropriations. I know they have reported legislation upon some bills, but they have never put particular legislation on a bill that the Senate did not put on. They have recommended it, and the Senate has said it should go on the bill. When the Committee on Military Affairs, for instance, has recommended legislation to the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Appropriations may have said, "We are in accord with you, and we will recommend it to the Senate." If the Committee on Appropriations did not recommend it to the Senate, any one of the members of the Senate could move that very amendment, provided it came from a standing committee. So the Committee on Appropriations has not arrogated to itself power to which it is not entitled.

Mr. President, I do not think that the Committee on Appropriations have any greater rights than any other committee. I do not assume that the committee have any greater intelligence than any other committee; but I will assert that most of the members of that committee at this particular time have an acquaintance with the business for which the committee was organized that the Senators who are not on that committee have not had and can not obtain without the expenditure of considerable time and effort upon their part. I do not mean to say that other committees can not learn in a few days all that is to be learned in relation to appropriations, but I will say that I do not believe there is a committee now that is qualified to take up these questions instantly. Of course Senators can set themselves to work, and can soon learn what has been done in former Congresses, what the statutes are, and all the things that have to be considered, and can go on with the work. I do not mean to say that there is going to be any difficulty in these committees doing this work, because if the Committee on Appropriations should be blotted out entirely and dismantled the business of the Senate would go on just exactly as it goes on now, and there would be just the same interest in each committee.

I have had but little experience on the Committee on Appropriations, but I am sure I shall be borne out by every Senator in this Chamber when I say that innumerable amendments are proposed at every session to the various appropriation bills which the majority of the Senate say ought not to go on the bills. They are proposed by the standing committees who have in charge some particular subject. Take, for instance, the Naval Committee. The Naval Committee proposes from time to time amendments which they want made and they are passed through that committee with a recommendation that they be made. They are referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but the Committee on Naval Affairs have absolutely as much control of them then as the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. President, I do not suppose that anybody will hold that it is any reflection upon the Committee on Naval Affairs when I say that we have had from that committee, ably presided over as it has been, with an able membership, repeated recommendations to which the Senate would not consent, and which it would not approve, and you will find that other committees have made similar recommendations. Each committee thinks that the subject committed to it is of more importance, perhaps, than any other, and while some other committee ought not to press its amendments that their amendments ought to be pressed. Instead of having one committee charged with the duty of making appropriations you will have a dozen committees charged with that duty. You will need to have more than that. If this new system of distribution is carried out there will be a further distribution. The one proposed is not sufficient, it is not logical, it is not equitable and just. When you have the appropriation bills distributed among a dozen committees each committee will say "the subject before us is important; we must have a liberal appropriation; and these other people may wait." So each committee when it reports its appropriation bill will come with an enlarged and an increased amount.

I have no right to discuss the question as to how this plan has worked in the House of Representatives, and I shall not do so. I only know what everybody else knows, that the appropriations in this country have signally, and I may say almost frightfully, increased in the last ten years. I do not know that there is any objection to it. It is possible the appropriations have been proper; but I have discovered when appropriation bills came to the Senate that repeatedly certain things were in that were wanted somewhere else, and certain other things which the law provided and declared should be appropriated for were not appropriated for at all.

As was said yesterday, it is not an unusual thing for the Committee on Appropriations to take up an appropriation bill, and to find, where the appropriation for a particular item is fixed by statute, that the appropriation only carried a sufficient amount for nine months instead of twelve.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senator frankly and for information. I may be mistaken, but it is my impression that, as a rule, the Senate has increased the appropriations over those made by the other House. That has been especially the case when they differed politically, to speak frankly about it. Is it not a fact, let me ask the Senator, that the Senate has increased the appropriations as they came from the House of Representatives? In the House they have these various subjects referred to different committees. I have heard it stated here repeatedly for ten years past that the division of the jurisdiction in the House of Representatives has increased appropriations. I undertook once to examine that matter, and I was not able to come to that conclusion; but the question I now put is, is it not a fact that, as a rule, the Senate has increased appropriation bills as they came from the House of Representatives?

Mr. TELLER. That is undoubtedly true, and is in line with what I was saying.

Mr. ALLISON. If I may say a word, that, as a rule, is true, and especially is it true as respects bills which come to us from the House Committee on Appropriations. It is not so true as respects other bills which come from the new committees to which the appropriation bills have been distributed.

You will find many cases where the Senate Committee on Appropriations have not increased, and a good many cases where they have diminished, the appropriations proposed to be made.

Later on in the debate, if I have an opportunity, I propose to deal at large with the very suggestion made by the Senator.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to make a statement?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. Notwithstanding the increase in the Senate, there have been deficiencies every year of from eight to thirteen million dollars.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I was saying. The people who have the first opportunity for providing in an appropriation bill put into it such items as they think they are more in earnest about and as they know might not be got on the bill in the Senate, and depend upon the Senate to make up for those items that are absolutely necessary for the carrying on of the Government. What I say does not refer to this session, because I do not wish to reflect upon the present Congress, but it is a fact well known by my associates on the committee that we have had appropriation bills sent from the other House, and we have seen members of the House committee follow the appropriation bill to the room of the Senate Appropriations Committee and say, "We want you to increase that appropriation we could not afford to put on."

The House of Representatives is the great political body. It is where they make politics in this country, and there has been a great strife to keep down appropriations apparently. There has been heretofore (I think, perhaps, I can reflect upon a dead and defunct House, but not upon a living House) a disposition in that body, I think, to refrain from putting in appropriation bills provisions which they knew were essential, absolutely necessary, so that they might swell some other appropriation; and then if this body happens to be of a different political organization—and it is immaterial whether it is Democratic or Republican; both parties play at that—then charge that the Senate has unduly increased the appropriations.

What is the duty of the Senate Appropriations Committee when the appropriation bill comes here which provides for the judiciary, for instance? Knowing exactly what it costs to pay the judges and what it cost the year before to maintain the courts, is it not our duty to report to the Senate in favor of such an appropriation as shall not leave a deficiency? We have a standing law that no department of the Government shall create a deficiency, and yet there has not been a year for the last ten years that the deficiencies have not been from six to fifteen million dollars. When those appropriations were passed through the other House there was as great certainty that the deficiency would exist as there was when the deficiency was reported from the Treasury Department to the House of Representatives at the coming session. The Senate being the conservative body, the body that does not appeal to the people for support as the other House does, it was thought the Senate could afford to take the responsibility of keeping the appropriations where they rightfully belonged and of seeing that the Government was not strangled or starved.

If there have been extravagant appropriations it is the fault of the Senate and not of the Committee on Appropriations. I venture to say that rarely ever have we passed a general, great big appropriation bill that the Senate has not put on against the protest of the committee sometimes large sums of money. In some cases I recollect that the Senate has put on very large sums of money. The Senate had a right to put on those sums, and it must not be presumed that the Senate put on anything that ought not to have gone on the bill. The committee might have had different views, but the Senate itself is the determiner of those questions, and it put on the amendments.

I believe that the most economical and logical arrangement that could be provided for now exists. I believe that one body, composed of members of the Senate, ought to have a general supervision and a general care of all the appropriation bills; that the body which recommends the appropriations to the Senate should know exactly what is being appropriated. That can not be known if you have ten or fifteen committees each reporting an appropriation bill. How can any other committee that sit down to consider the question before them know what the other committee is going to do which may not report until after they have reported? When you have one committee you have everything under the eye of the committee. They know first what is the revenue. Then they know what is necessary to the successful carrying on of the Government and for bringing the appropriations within the revenue. You can not know when you have twelve or fifteen committees, as you will have if you commence this new system, because, as I said before, the system will be enlarged rightfully and properly.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] has moved an amendment which is in perfect keeping with the principle that is proposed to be started upon. There can be a half dozen more such amendments moved. There are matters now left to the Committee on Appropriations that do not rightfully belong to that committee if they are not to have general supervision and general direction of all the appropriation bills that come before the Senate. I am confident that it will increase the public expense. I do not see how the Senate itself can be informed properly as to what is the condition of the finances and what is the condition of the appropriations unless there is somebody charged with the duty, as has been done heretofore, and that is the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, of informing the Senate, first, what is the revenue, then what can we afford to appropriate and what is necessary to be appropriated, which the committee determine after consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury and the officials charged with submitting reports on that subject.

Mr. President, I do not know, as I said before, that it is of any consequence whether or not the public expenses are increased. We can go on, I suppose, and continue to do what we are doing now—run in debt and borrow money to pay expenses; and as I learn to-day that we have such wonderful credit that we have received bids for our bonds to the extent of $500,000,000, I suppose we will keep right along running in debt. As is suggested to me, the country has got into a condition where there does not seem to be any legitimate business except bond buying and bond selling, and I suppose we need not disturb ourselves, but let the next generation deal with the matter.

Mr. PEFFER. We had better borrow while our credit is good.

Mr. TELLER. Yes. There is one thing on which I should like to congratulate the country, and that is that after all the talk about our lack of credit, if I am not misinformed, when we want to dispose of $100,000,000 of bonds we have more than $500,000,000 bid for—$568,000,000, a Senator says. If those bonds had been offered as they ought to have been offered, if the Secretary of the Treasury had stated, "I will receive bids at a fixed figure," in my judgment the amount of the bids would have been very much larger. I know people who would have liked to have bid upon those bonds, but they did not know how to bid, and were compelled to go to their bankers to bid. This is a little outside of the question before the Senate, except that I think the financial question is one that perhaps is appropriate to debate at all times, because it seems to be so little understood, and there seems to be so little known about it. Especially do I think it is not out of place after the suggestion we had from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] and some others about the extremis that the Government was in a year ago, when it made the wonderful sale to the syndicate.

I remember that then the Senator made the Chamber sound with his doleful cry of the lack of credit; how we had kept the wires hot between here and Europe begging the foreigners to take our securities. I think that some of us then said that if the Administration had turned their eyes inside and addressed themselves to the American people they would have found an abundance of support, and that is shown to be true now. Clumsy and awkward as has been this transaction, miscalled a popular loan, but not a popular loan, yet there has been $568,000,000 bid. I do not know what the average will be, but it will be way above what I understand was proposed to be given by the syndicate.

I will state again that I have before me now the reasoning of several gentlemen upon the question before the Senate, but I do not care to stop to read it. They are men of large experience in public affairs, and they declare that the system under which we are now operating is a proper and safe one, and that the proposed system is a dangerous one. I do not care to read it because I do not suppose it makes very much difference. Each Senator will think for himself upon the question.

Senators who intend to vote for the resolution did not need, so far as I am concerned, to make any excuses as to why they are going to vote in that way. If they think the public service would be better served by the adoption of the resolution, I should have a very poor opinion of them if they did not vote for it. It is a question simply of judgment, I suppose. I do not believe any good will come from the adoption of the resolution. I believe some harm may come from it, and I believe will come from it. But I shall not take personal offense because somebody thinks that I am not so well qualified to discharge the duties on a committee of this kind as he is. Very likely he may be correct. So I shall not go into grief or mourning whatever may be the result.

I shall myself very much regret to see the course that has been pursued here for so many years, and, I think, successfully and satisfactorily, abruptly destroyed practically without any notice at all, and to see the different committees taking up the appropriations bills and reporting them. I imagine that at the present session they will be extremely careful that the appropriations reported are not excessive; they will be moderate and economical now; but I believe you will find that there will be an extension gradually, little by little, and in the end we will all regret that we did not adhere to the old system.

I repeat that that system has really met with no complaint in the Senate until within the past few days, and the specific complaint so far as it has been made, has been shown to be without the slightest foundation.

Mr. BATE. As there seems to be no likelihood that we shall come to a vote on the question to-night, several Senators desiring to speak on the subject, I suggest that we have an executive session. With the consent of the Senator from Idaho, who has charge of the resolution, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DUBOIS. I have no objection to that course. I trust we can have a vote on the resolution to-morrow, however.

Mr. BATE. I do not want to insist upon my motion at the expense of the resolution.

Mr. TELLER. It will not interfere with the resolution or displace it.

Mr. BATE. Is there any chance to get a vote to-night?

Mr. HILL. If nobody wishes to speak we might secure a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the resolution.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from New York knows very well that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations wishes to submit some remarks, and the Senator from New York can not expect the Senator from Iowa to go on at this hour.

Mr. HILL. I did not understand that the Senator from Iowa desires to speak. If he does, of course he should have the opportunity.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Iowa stated that he desires to discuss the matter fully, and I think he should be accorded an opportunity to do so.

Mr. HALE. There are several Senators who wish to speak.

Mr. HILL. There will be plenty of time.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads, and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes;

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BATE. Under the circumstances, no one being ready to speak further on the question now pending, I think it is a very suitable time to have an executive session. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 6, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 5, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PRIZE FIGHTS IN TERRITORIES AND DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to introduce a bill, and I ask that it be read to the House for information, after which I will make an explanation and then ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report. This bill, the Chair understands, has not been reported by a committee, and the House should pay attention to it.

Mr. CANNON. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Is it a long bill?

Mr. CATRON. No; it has only three sections.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand that this is a bill that has not been reported by a committee.

Mr. CATRON. This is a bill to provide for the prevention of prize fights in the Territories and the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope gentlemen will allow this bill to be read. I do not think there is a man in the House who will object to it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Do I understand the gentleman to say it has been considered by members of the committee informally?

Mr. HENDERSON. It has by individual members.

The title of the bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5566) to prohibit prize fighting and pugilism and fights between men and animals, and to provide penalties therefor, in the Territories and the District of Columbia.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask that that bill be sent to the proper committee. I object to its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that it was submitted to the House without having first received the approval of a committee because of the exigency which the gentleman from New Mexico stated.

Mr. HENDERSON. This prize fight is set for the 14th of this month, and unless the bill is considered now it can not get through both the House and the Senate and to the President for his approval.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Then I ask for an explanation of the bill.

Mr. CATRON. I understand, and it is notorious, that a series of prize fights have been advertised to come off at or near El Paso, in the State of Texas.

Mr. SAYERS. Not in Texas.

Mr. CATRON. At or near El Paso, but not in the State of Texas, as they can not come off there; to commence on the 14th of the present month and continue until they are concluded. The New Mexico line is within about 3 miles of El Paso, and can be reached on the Southern Pacific Railroad from that city. The governor of the Territory of New Mexico, as the public prints have announced, has stated that he knows of no law in New Mexico by which these prize fights can be stopped. I believe they could be stopped if the governor desired to stop them; but it seems that he has no such disposition. The Congress of the United States can control these Territories, and can control this District of Columbia. As I understand, the purpose is not only to bring these prize fighters into New Mexico, just across the line from the city of El Paso, where they are now collecting, and have this series of fights for a number of days; but it is also the purpose to import to that town a lot of bull fighters from the City of Mexico, who are now en route from Mexico. The bill I have prepared is an exact copy of the law that has lately been adopted by the State of Texas at a special session of the legislature of that State, except the second section, which provides for the punishment of those who aid, abet, or assist in the matter. Unless Congress can act upon the matter at once, these fights will go on. If this bill should go to a committee to be considered the probabilities are that it will not reach this House in time to pass the Senate and get to the President for his approval before these fights can be had. I therefore ask that we may have immediate consideration of this bill.

Mr. KNOX. I will ask the gentleman a question for information, if he will permit me. Does this bill provide that anybody being present at a prize fight or any personal encounter with fists or gloves, independent of their age, shall be punished by imprisonment of not less than five years?

Mr. CATRON. It provides for the punishment of those who aid, abet, and assist.

Mr. KNOX. It might as well provide for capital punishment. I object to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let the bill be referred to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

OUTLETS ON THE GREAT LAKES.

Mr. HOOKER, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported a resolution, No. 40, calling on the Secretary of War for information, cost, and estimates of making surveys of certain outlets on the Great Lakes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GROUT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont calls for the regular order, which is on agreeing to the amendments to the District of Columbia appropriation bill. The Clerk will report the first amendment upon which a separate vote is asked. Are there any amendments upon which a separate vote is not asked?

Mr. GROUT. As I understand, Mr. Speaker, a separate vote has really been demanded on only two amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Alabama requested separate votes.

Mr. WHEELER. Our action will depend upon the vote on this amendment which comes first.

Mr. GROUT. Let me ask the gentleman what amendment he refers to as coming first?

Mr. WHEELER. The German Orphan Asylum.

Mr. GROUT. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "For the German Orphan Asylum, maintenance, $1,800."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, let us take a vote now on the other amendment proposed by the committee, striking out lines 16, 17, and 18 on page 39 and inserting what is known as the Hainer amendment, remitting these several charities to the board of children's guardians.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 39, in line 16, after the words "place to place," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert "$43,200; in all, $47,200: Provided, That the institutions for children, including industrial and reformatory, namely, the Church Orphanage of St. John's Parish; the German Orphan Asylum, including its care of colored foundlings; the St. Ann's Infant Asylum, the Association for Works of Mercy, the St. Joseph Asylum, the House of the Good Shepherd, and St. Rose's Industrial School, heretofore receiving aid by specific appropriation, are hereby remitted, except as herein specifically appropriated for, to the appropriation herein made, and to the said act of July 26, 1892, to provide for the care of dependent children in the District of Columbia, and to create a board of children's guardians, for all rights and benefits which they may have under the provisions of the said act."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, that comes after the other.

The SPEAKER. The other amendment has been voted upon.

Mr. WHEELER. But the one that we desire a separate vote upon has not yet been acted upon, I understand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WHEELER. We asked for a separate vote on the amendment striking out the St. John's Orphan Asylum, and also on the amendments striking out St. Ann's Infant Asylum and the House of the Good Shepherd. I suppose the action so far taken does not preclude action on those amendments afterwards.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands not. It is the right of any member to have a separate vote upon any amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just reported.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I ask for a division. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. As I understand it, to vote aye is to vote in favor of the amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BRUMM. I should like to have that amendment reported again, if it can be done.

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MILES. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 51; so the amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman desire a separate vote upon any other amendment?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire a separate vote on the amendment striking out the Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish.

The SPEAKER. Is there a demand for a separate vote upon any other amendment?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I desire to have separate votes also upon the amendments striking out the St. Ann's Infant Asylum and the House of the Good Shepherd.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, lines 8, 9, and 10, strike out the words "For the Church Orphanage Association, St. John's Parish, maintenance, $1,800."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to occupy one minute.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRUMM. As I understand, the appropriation that is embodied in the amendment already adopted provides for these institutions, and——

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRUMM. But I have not finished my question. Now, if I am correct in that, would not the retention of this provision in the bill be giving an additional specific appropriation for a purpose that is already provided for?

The SPEAKER. The Chair hardly thinks that is a parliamentary inquiry. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know just what is the vote to be taken. My understanding is that the Committee of the Whole House struck out this item—that that is the amendment of the committee—so that now to vote "aye" is to vote in favor of striking out the paragraph.

The SPEAKER. A vote in the affirmative is a vote to sustain the action of the committee. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 47; so the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

Page 38, beginning on line 15, strike out the words "For St. Ann's Infant Asylum, maintenance, $5,400."

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote asked upon this amendment?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask a separate vote.

The question being taken, the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

Page 38, beginning on line 19, strike out the words "for House of the Good Shepherd, maintenance, $2,700."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote asked for upon any of the remaining amendments? If not, the Chair will put the question upon them all together. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire a separate vote upon any of them?

Mr. WHEELER. We will not ask for separate votes on any more of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question, then, is on agreeing to the remaining amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRISP. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, 47 gentlemen voted in the affirmative, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will take their seats, and the House will be in order, so that the responses of members may be heard.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it competent now to move a recommitment of this bill to the committee that reported it?

The SPEAKER. The impression of the Chair is that it is not.

Mr. HEPBURN. I supposed this was the time when that motion should be made.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the passage of the bill, and the Chair was simply suspending the roll call in the interest of order, so that the responses of members might be heard. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose that on the vote about to be taken the bill should fail to pass; would it then be in order to move to recommit?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not like to undertake to answer that question without a little more examination.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think it would be.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the roll call.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 144, not voting 77; as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was rejected.
The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, to reconsider the vote by which the bill was refused passage.
Mr. CRISP. On that I demand the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were not ordered, those rising in support of the demand being less than one-fifth of the last vote.
Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask tellers on the yeas and nays.
Tellers were ordered.
The SPEAKER appointed Mr. CRISP and Mr. GROSVENOR as tellers.
The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes not counted.
Mr. GROSVENOR. I waive further count.
So, no further count being demanded, the yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 188, nays 82, not voting 86; as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to reexamine and report a new paragraph of so much of the bill as appears under the subhead "For charities."

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will withhold that for a moment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry, and understood that the Chair had already recognized me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, under the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to recommit, it will be competent for the Committee on Appropriations, in the event that the motion prevails, to review other paragraphs of the bill than the one specifically mentioned by him, relating to charities?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now I ask the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CRISP. I believe, as there was no debate before the previous question, there is now, under the rule, a certain time allowed for debate.

The SPEAKER. But there was debate on the general question, which the Chair thinks precludes further debate under the operation of the previous question on this motion.

Mr. CRISP. But, Mr. Speaker, that question has been exhausted; the previous question has already operated to a conclusion; and we have now an entirely new proposition, subject to debate under rulings heretofore made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. In the Twenty-seventh Congress, on page 128 of the Journal of the first session, I find the following:

The House having yesterday decided to reconsider the vote of the 7th instant, adopting the said resolution, the amendment proposed by Mr. Rayner to the resolution was read; and, after some conversation as to whether that amendment was in order or not, Mr. Rayner withdrew it, and the question again recurred on Mr. Wise's resolution, when Mr. Barnard submitted a question of order, as follows.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. I should like to know what the gentleman is saying, and I can not hear a word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia will be kind enough to suspend for a moment. The House will please be in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman please refer to the rule again on which he bases his proposition?

Mr. CRISP. I will repeat, so that my friend from Ohio will understand it. The point that I made to the Speaker was that this motion of the gentleman, not having been previously debated and the previous question having been ordered upon it, that under the rules there was a limited amount of debate upon it—fifteen minutes upon a side. The Speaker suggested that the previous question had been ordered upon the passage of the bill, which is true, and which, if not divested by the vote of the House, would cut off all debate upon any collateral motion or any motion that might follow after, and the point that I was proceeding to make was that it had been decided in the Twenty-seventh Congress that the reconsideration of a final vote by the House divested the question of the previous question and left it again open to debate and to amendment, and I was proceeding to relate what took place. It is very short and I will read all that appears in the Journal:

The House resumed the consideration of the questions arising out of the motion of Mr. Fornance, of the 8th instant, to reconsider the vote of the 7th instant adopting the resolution moved by Mr. Wise for the appointment of a committee to report rules for the government of the House and adopting temporarily the rules and orders of the last House of Representatives.

The House having yesterday decided to reconsider the vote of the 7th instant adopting the said resolution, the amendment proposed by Mr. Rayner to the resolution was read; and, after some conversation as to whether that amendment was in order or not, Mr. Rayner withdrew it, and the question again recurred on Mr. Wise's resolution, when Mr. Barnard submitted a question of order, as follows.

To this I desire to call the special attention of the Speaker. It appears that at that time they put their questions of order in writing. This is stated in this way:

The House had passed a resolution adopting certain rules and orders for its own government; this resolution was passed under the operation of the previous question by which the House determined that the question on the resolution should be taken without further debate. Yesterday the House determined to reconsider the vote adopting the said resolution. This restored the question on that resolution to the position in which it stood at the moment of taking the first vote thereon; the previous question still applies, and the question must now be taken without debate or amendment—

That is, the question of order presented.

The Speaker decided that the House having reconsidered the vote adopting the resolution, the proceeding was restored to the precise point at which it was when the question to agree to the resolution was put; that the question, Will the House agree to the resolution? immediately recurred upon the passing of the vote to reconsider, and it was the question now before the House; that, as that question had been decided on the 8th instant, under the operation of the previous question, the previous question now operated upon it, and consequently it was not open to debate or amendment.

From this decision Mr. Wise appealed, on the ground that a previous question expended itself when once put and decided; that having been put on the 8th instant and decided, it could no longer be applied to the present proceeding unless renewed; and, consequently, that the proposition before the House was open both to amendment and debate.

Mr. Proffit moved the previous question on the appeal, and it was seconded by a member.

A call of the House was then moved by Mr. Adams, and was refused.

And the previous question was put, viz, Shall the main question be now put?

And passed in the affirmative.

And the question was put, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

And passed in the negative	Yeas	105
	Nays	112

So that the decision of the Chair was reversed, and it was decided that the previous question, when once put, no longer operated.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, Mr. Speaker, from that day to this there has been no different ruling.

Mr. DINGLEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if he thinks that is a parallel case to the present? Supposing after reconsideration had been had a motion had been made to amend, and then the previous question had been ordered by the House upon that motion, would the gentleman contend that in this situation of the bill the amendment could have been debated fifteen minutes on either side after the previous question had been ordered?

Mr. CRISP. That is a different question.

Mr. DINGLEY. And does it not apply to the motion to recommit?

Mr. CRISP. Well, that is the real question, whether or not that is the identical question. I should think that if an amendment were offered under those circumstances, and the previous question were ordered upon it, it is likely it would not be debatable.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman from Ohio has moved to recommit, and then has moved the previous question, and the House has ordered the previous question on that motion. Now, on what ground does the gentleman from Georgia claim that this question is open to discussion?

Mr. CRISP. The rule I claim it under I will read to the gentleman.

Mr. DINGLEY. You refer to the fifteen minutes' debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Maine if he understands that the previous question has been ordered generally or only on the motion to recommit?

Mr. DINGLEY. The previous question has been ordered on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Then, if the previous question was divested by the carrying of the motion to reconsider, the motion for the previous question is only upon the present question—that is, the motion to recommit; and the rule of the House says:

And the same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does not the word "proposition" refer to any bill that has been offered, or does it refer to an incidental motion on a bill that has already been considered or being considered? The suggestion I made was: Suppose the gentleman from Ohio made a motion to amend this very bill instead of moving to recommit, and then had moved the previous question and the House had ordered the previous question on the motion to amend, would the gentleman from Georgia contend that because of the rule that has been just referred to that he had the right of fifteen minutes' debate on the motion to amend, the bill having already been considered by the House, and this being merely an incidental matter? Has the gentleman considered as to whether that rule was intended to apply to a proposition of this character?

Mr. CRISP. Here is a distinct proposition, which disposes of the bill. This takes the whole bill from the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. It would no more than a motion to strike out all after the enacting clause, and the motion would be an incidental one arising on a proposition that has already been considered by the House.

Mr. CRISP. I do not see how the gentleman can draw that distinction. Here is a proposition to recommit a bill or to commit a bill, as you please, which bill has been divested of the previous question entirely, and the gentleman makes this independent proposition and the previous question has been ordered upon it.

Mr. DINGLEY. But I want to ask my friend from Georgia is a motion to recommit a bill that has already been before the House any more an independent proposition than a motion to amend would be? He would not contend, surely, that a motion to amend a bill already considered by the House would admit, after the previous question had been ordered, of fifteen minutes' debate on either side. The gentleman from Ohio has moved, and the House has ordered, the previous question on the motion to recommit, which is an incidental motion on a proposition that has been considered and debated by the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that the phraseology used there could have no application if it did not apply to a question of this kind. Debate has been provided for under certain circumstances, and then, as if to cover cases of this sort, the provision of the rule which the Chair has just read was incorporated, and it seems to me that it is useless if it does not apply to propositions of this sort. There is no exception to it as read by the Chair.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think the general parliamentary question is a very important one, much more important in its operation upon the future than upon anything in the present, or its operation upon this question.

Mr. CRISP. Before the gentleman proceeds, I desire to say that I agree with him as to its importance. I only want five minutes; and if the gentleman will give me five minutes I will withdraw the point and the Chair can consider it at his leisure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well; I suggest that the matter be left over. The gentleman can have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has the floor, unless he yields it.

Mr. CRISP. I have stated that I will withdraw the point of order from the consideration of the Speaker, conceding that it is a very important one, if the gentleman from Ohio will simply withhold his demand and let me have five minutes for debate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am willing that the gentleman shall have the same amount of time as shall be allowed on this side.

Mr. CRISP. I only wanted five minutes on the motion to recommit.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think, Mr. Speaker, that is a fair proposition, because the parliamentary question is one that is far-reaching and important. I ask unanimous consent, pending this motion to recommit, that there be ten minutes of debate, five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia and five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. LACEY. Before that is put, I would like to ask a question. This is a parliamentary question that will come up further on.

I would like to ask in this connection, because we want to know what the rule is on this subject——

Mr. CRISP. We are not going to have any ruling until the question has been investigated more thoroughly.

Mr. LACEY. But, Mr. Speaker, I observe that Rule XVII omits any provision for the fifteen minutes' debate which was provided for in the last Congress.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is provided for elsewhere, in Rule XXVIII, paragraph 3.

Mr. LACEY. The question is, whether it is provided for there. That rule provides only for what is to be done on a motion for the suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. No; "And the same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate."

The question seems to turn on the meaning of the word "proposition" in the rule. The Chair has his impression about it, but if the House does not desire to have it decided now, the Chair will put the request for unanimous consent made by the gentleman from Ohio. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I desire that five minutes only for the purpose of congratulating the majority in the House of Representatives on their capacity to "transact the public business." [Laughter.] I have been a member of this House quite a number of years; there are other members who have had a much longer service; I have made some inquiry, and I believe that this is the first time in the history of the Government that a general appropriation bill has been brought into the House, duly considered, and, upon a yea-and-nay vote, the House has refused to pass it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a noteworthy event. I recollect that our friend who now occupies the Speaker's chair, in the last Congress and in the Congress preceding, used very often to stand about where my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] now sits, and congratulate this side of the House on their capacity to "transact the public business," and it affords me infinite pleasure now to return the compliment, and to say that whatever our misdoings or shortcomings may have been, we never reached that state of disorganization where we were unable to frame and pass an ordinary general appropriation bill. [Laughter. Applause on the Democratic side.]

This bill applies to the District of Columbia. It appropriates for the support of this beautiful city, of which we are all so proud, and we have been told time and time again during the consideration of the bill that we were acting as a board of aldermen or a common council. Now, that being so, I want to say to you, my friends on the other side, with the utmost good nature, that you have written yourselves down, by your action here to-day, as incompetent to discharge the duties of a board of aldermen for the city of Washington. [Applause on the Democratic side, and laughter.] You present a bill to make appropriations for the District of Columbia. It is considered in the House, some of our friends earnestly assail it. You amend it, and I doubt whether any of you know now exactly what this mutilated bill is. [Laughter.] The bill is brought to a vote, and a majority of the House vote it down. Then, by a little effort of the leaders on your side, by a little stirring around the edges and lobbies, and by the promise: "If you will vote against this motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table and will help us to reconsider this bill, we will recommit it, and the committee will fix it right" [laughter]—in that way you have got your party, in the main, together; and all that means just this—you confess before the whole country, in spite of all your professions of capacity, that you are incompetent to transact the ordinary public business of the United States. [Laughter. Applause on the Democratic side.] You have not only shown it on this bill, but you have shown it on the bond bill that you have passed; you have shown it on the tariff bill that you passed here some time ago; and, though I am no prophet nor the son of a prophet, I predict that there will hardly come a month or a week from now until the time this Congress adjourns in which it will not be developed by your action here that your majority is utterly incapable of intelligently and properly transacting the public business of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the difference between this side of the House and that side is, that this side of the House is capable of rectifying any mistakes that we may make, while that side of the House is not. [Applause on the Republican side.]

That side of the House passed a tariff bill on one occasion, and it came back here with 644 amendments, 644 mistakes, 644 blunders; and what did that side of the House do? They did not have the capacity to extricate themselves out of the mess, but plunged headlong into it, and the people of the United States have punished them and will continue to punish them for their incapacity. [Laughter. Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, first, in answer to the leather and prunella which proceeds from the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], let me say that substantially this bill which has just been recommitted, or one similar to it, was passed in the Fifty-second Congress, while that gentleman had the honor to be Speaker, by a substantially solid Democratic vote; while as to this bill, which, I repeat, is in substance the same as the bill then passed, there is almost a solid Democratic vote against it. Let that go for what it is worth. This bill was reported to the House with the entire approval of the minority of the committee. It has been developed here for three or four days that the House of Representatives, upon both sides, if we can judge from the votes, has not been satisfied with a portion of this bill, and, as is perfectly proper if the House is not satisfied, it recommits the bill to an organ of the House, a committee of its own creation, with instructions to further consider and report a bill for consideration by the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. A small portion of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. No doubt that committee will proceed to comply with the direction which the House has given. [Applause.]

So far as progress by this House is concerned, and our competency to legislate, never in the history of this country has any House of Representatives made such a good record for action touching important legislation as has been made by this House. [Applause on the Republican side.] And with that fact staring us in the face, we can afford to let the gentleman from Georgia rail. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. If this bill shall be recommitted to the Appropriations Committee and reported back from that committee, will the provisions as to charities require consideration in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question when the bill is reported back.

Mr. DOCKERY. I also desire to ask whether any other portion of the bill than that covered by the motion of the gentleman from Ohio will be open to amendment and consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only give an impression, which is that it will not be, but does not undertake now to give a final decision upon the question.

Mr. HENDERSON. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to recommit the bill with the instructions which have been reported to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PROHIBITION OF PRIZE FIGHTING, ETC.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, this morning a request was made for unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill prohibiting prize fighting in the Territories and the District of Columbia. Objection was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KNOX], and the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee has considered it, and now I am authorized to report it back and ask its immediate consideration. Various amendments have been made, or rather the bill has been recast or redrafted so as to meet the objections of the objectors. I presume it is necessary for me to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill, which I now do.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked for the immediate consideration of the substitute bill, which will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5566) to prohibit prize fighting and pugilism and fights between men and animals and to provide penalties therefor in the Territories and District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who, in any of the Territories or the District of Columbia, shall voluntarily engage in a pugilistic encounter between man and man, or a fight between a man and a bull, or any other animal, for money or for other thing of value, or for any championship, or upon the result of which any money or anything of value is bet or wagered, or to see which any admission fee is charged, either directly or indirectly, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years.

SEC. 2. By the term "pugilistic encounter," as used in this bill, is meant any voluntary fight by blows by means of fists, or otherwise, whether with or without gloves, between two or more men, for money or for a prize of any character, or for any other thing of value, or for any championship, or upon the result of which any money or anything of value is bet or wagered, or to see which any admission fee is charged, either directly or indirectly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to address an inquiry to the gentleman from Iowa. I do not want to object.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection (and the Chair hears none) the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield to the inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood the gentleman from Iowa to say that this bill had been considered and reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Has the Judiciary Committee authority from the House to sit during the sessions of the House? If not, I do not see how it is possible that the bill can have been considered by the Judiciary Committee since objection was made this morning to its consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, if the gentleman wishes to raise that point, I will say we considered it in an informal way.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have not raised any objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. Every member of the committee has been consulted and has assented to the bill as now reported.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It occurs to me that a bill of this importance, making certain acts felonies and prescribing penalties therefor, including punishment in the penitentiary, ought to be very carefully drawn.

Mr. HENDERSON. The bill has been considered carefully, and every member of the committee has given his assent to it and has requested that it be brought up in this way.

Mr. BAILEY. In reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], I want to say that while I agreed that the bill be reported and have no objection to its consideration, I do not want to be regarded as responsible for what the bill contains.

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and I gave the measure the closest examination, and we made such changes as to meet the objections. Every member of the committee was consulted.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Does this bill cover cockfights?

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, if a cock is an animal it does.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I do not think it is. [Laughter.] Or I will say to the gentleman, as Diogenes expressed it, it is if it has no feathers. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman is a high authority on everything connected with the turf. I do not feel it necessary to reply further.

I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KNOX].

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, my objection to this bill was strictly a legal objection, and was not made because I was in any way opposed to the principles or purpose of the measure. The second section of the bill, as it was offered, provided, according to the reply made by the Delegate from New Mexico, that any person, no matter of what age or sex, who might be found present at a personal encounter where an admission fee was charged, was to be regarded as guilty of a felony and punished by imprisonment for a minimum term of five years. The third section, which undertook to define a fight with a man or an animal, declared that it meant a personal encounter where blows were exchanged. Clearly that would apply to a football match, and very likely to nearly all the college athletic games. I very much question, if the bill were enacted in that form, whether it might not send to the penitentiary some of the sons of members of this House for a minimum term of five years.

Mr. HENDERSON. Thereby punishing the wrong fellows.

Mr. KNOX. Yes, sir. But by the reference to the Judiciary Committee those elements have been eliminated from the bill, and it now applies strictly to a fight between man and man or a fight between a man and an animal. The bill being thus amended, I am heartily in favor of its purpose, and I hope it will be speedily considered and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the previous question on the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question before that?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. According to what statute, or in conformity with what statute, may I ask, has the bill been framed? What has been the model, in other words, on which the committee acted?

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, we followed more closely the Texas legislation than any other, because that was enacted to catch the same fellows that we were after.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Are the penalties the same in each case?

Mr. BAILEY. No.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What is the penalty in Texas.

Mr. CATRON. Not less than two nor more than five years' imprisonment.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Why increase the penalties in this act?

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, in that respect we are acting entirely independently of any of the States. It did not seem to the members of the committee any too much of a penalty, because the sentiment of the country is absolutely against this barbarous practice, and if we are going to act let us do it in such a way as to show our determination to put a stop to it.

We left, too, the football playing out, I will say to my friend from New York, although from the exhibitions that I have seen of the game myself I would have been very glad to include it [laughter], but we left it out to please my friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KNOX], and other gentlemen.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I would ask whether this would not bar out all amateur contests as well?

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, it will certainly bar out all prize fighting, whether it be a prize fight for a prize in a college or elsewhere, no matter where. There is no doubt of that. If they are going to have prize fights for prizes, with or without gloves, either in the prize ring or in the colleges, they will certainly come within the provisions of this bill. The bill has been made broad enough to cover all cases of misdemeanor of this character, whether it be by college students, or by the Morrisseys, or anybody else.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is it not a very much more severe statute than that adopted in any State of the Union?

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, I do not know as to that.

Mr. KNOX. This bill, as it comes from the committee, does not include amateur contests, such as exhibitions of boxing. The third section provides for that.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I think the gentleman from Iowa will admit that it covers any prize fight or amateur contest in any college or anywhere else.

Mr. MORSE. If it does not it ought to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Iowa whether this would cover fights between the bulls and bears in the bucket shops of Washington? [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, I will have to leave that to some one who is more familiar with that branch of the subject than I am. I have no acquaintance with the bucket shops of Washington.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does the bill go so far as to prohibit prize fighting on naval vessels of the United States? I remember, according to the public journals last summer, that a prize fight was reported to have taken place on one of the vessels of the United States Navy.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not think the bill reaches that class. We thought we would leave that to the efficient officers of the Navy. We thought that this was a matter which would require very prompt action, and did not want to provoke any trouble with regard to getting it through. The able chairman of the Naval Committee, now sitting before me, can control that matter. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Before that, let me make a parliamentary inquiry. Has unanimous consent been given for the consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it was given. The Chair asked, very distinctly, at the time the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] was occupying the floor, and there was no objection.

Mr. MEREDITH. We did not understand what the bill was, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I did not understand that unanimous consent had been given. I thought a discussion took place and that that question was not put to the House at the time.

The SPEAKER. It was submitted.

Mr. MEREDITH. We did not understand that this bill was before the House for consideration, and under the circumstances I think the gentleman ought to withdraw it.

Mr. BOATNER. Before the gentleman from Iowa demands the previous question I would like to make a single suggestion.

Mr. HENDERSON. Everybody is anxious to get on with the bond bill and I do not wish to take up any more time than is necessary, but I yield to my colleague on the committee for a suggestion.

Mr. BOATNER. I would suggest to the gentleman whether the severity of the penalty fixed in the bill might not endanger the conviction of offenders? An imprisonment for five years at hard labor might not be too severe for an aggravated case coming under the provisions of the bill, but cases might arise where there had been an infraction of the law and the juries would hesitate to convict and it would be difficult to obtain conviction under a penalty so severe. I suggest that a reduction of the penalty be made, so that it be not less than one year or more than three, for instance.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think that the penalty is none too severe. It is unquestionably the judgment of the best people in America that severe penalties should be enforced to break up this practice.

Mr. BOATNER. I want to suggest to the gentleman that the experience of judicial proceedings is that what the public may consider to be a very severe punishment frequently prevents conviction, and that while the public sentiment of the country at this time may and does support this severe penalty, yet that subsequently it may be considered too severe. If we make the penalty not less than one year nor more than five, that would allow the punishment to be graded according to the nature of the offense.

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman's proposition is to have it not less than one nor more than five years, in the discretion of the court?

Mr. BOATNER. Yes, not less than one nor more than five.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am willing to consent to that amendment.

Mr. BOATNER. I offer that amendment, with the consent of the gentleman.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not understand that this bill has any relation to dueling. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh, no; not at all. We can not afford to stop that. [Laughter.] I ask the previous question on the bill and the amendment which has been suggested.

Mr. MEREDITH. Would it be in order to move to recommit this bill to the Judiciary Committee?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order.

Mr. MEREDITH. I make that motion, sir. This bill has not been printed. It has not been read by the members, and we do not know what its effect is.

Mr. HENDERSON. We know very well what its effect is, and we know this fight is coming off on the 14th, and this bill must pass both Houses and get to the President before that time. States have acted quickly, and why can not the American Congress act? [Applause.]

Mr. MEREDITH. I make the motion that this be recommitted to the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put the motion at the proper time. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill so that it will read:

And upon such conviction shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill, and pending that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. MEREDITH, and it was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill No. 2904, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill, with the amendments of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 2904) entitled "An act to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue," do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That from and after the passage of this act the mints of the United States shall be open to the coinage of silver, and there shall be coined dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, of standard silver, nine-tenths fine, as provided by the act of January 18, 1837, and upon the same terms and subject to the limitations and provisions of law regulating the coinage and legal-tender quality of gold; and whenever the said coins herein provided for shall be received into the Treasury, certificates may be issued therefor in the manner now provided by law.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury hall coin into standard silver dollars, as soon as practicable, according to the provisions of section 1 of this act, from the silver bullion purchased under authority of the act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," that portion of said silver bullion which represents the seigniorage or profit to the Government, to wit, the difference between the cost of the silver purchased under said act and its coinage value, and said silver dollars so coined shall be used in the payment of the current expenses of the Government; and for the purpose of making the said seigniorage immediately available for use as money, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue silver certificates against it, as if it was already coined and in the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That no national-bank note shall be hereafter issued of a denomination less than $10, and all notes of such banks now outstanding of denominations less than that sum shall be, as rapidly as practicable, taken up, redeemed, and canceled, and notes of $10 and larger denominations shall be issued in their stead under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem the United States notes, commonly called "greenbacks," and also the Treasury notes issued under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890, when presented for redemption, in standard silver dollars or in gold coin, using for redemption of said notes either gold or silver coins, or both, not at the option of the holder, but exclusively at the option of the Treasury Department, and said notes, commonly called "greenbacks," when so redeemed shall be reissued, as provided by the act of May 31, 1878.

Amend the title so as to read: An act to restore the coinage of silver dollars, and for other purposes.

Mr. DINGLEY Mr. Chairman, at the proper time, under the instructions of the Committee on Ways and Means, I shall move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment in the nature of a substitute and insist upon the bill as it passed the House.

If there were no other reasons, Mr. Chairman, for nonconcurring in the substitute amendment of the Senate, it would be sufficient that the Senate has returned to the House not one line or one word of the bill which the House sent to the other body, but a substitute on another subject entirely distinct, which, if it had been moved as an amendment in the House, would at once have been ruled out of order as not germane to the subject which the House was considering.

WHAT THE HOUSE PROPOSED.

The House sent to the Senate two bills. The first provided for an increase of the revenue to the extent of about $40,000,000, to prevent deficiencies and to furnish the Government sufficient revenue to meet its expenses. It also sent to the Senate a second bill—the pending bill—proposing three things: First, authorizing a reduction of the rate of interest and the length of time during which bonds should run, when issued under the resumption act of 1875; reducing the rate of interest from 4 per cent, as provided under that act, to 3 per cent; and reducing the length of time which the bonds had to run from thirty years to five years, with a maximum of fifteen years.

The bill as sent from the House to the Senate also provided that whenever bonds should be issued under the act of 1875 they should be offered first to the American people as a popular loan; and lastly, that the proceeds of the sale of the bonds under the act of 1875 should be devoted exclusively to resumption purposes under that act, and that whenever, incidentally, there should be a failure of revenue to meet the expenses certificates of indebtedness running three years and payable from revenue to accrue should be used instead of the proceeds of the sale of bonds.

The House is entitled to some answer to the propositions in which they asked the concurrence of the Senate. If the Senate had returned the House bill with an amendment, proposing to repeal the act of 1875, there would have been at least some relevancy in their action. But a majority of the Senate distinctly defeated a proposition of that kind, thus practically confirming the continuance of the issuance of bonds under the act of 1875, running thirty years and bearing 4 per cent interest, and refusing to authorize a reduction of the rate of interest to 3 per cent and limitation of time to fifteen years; and doing this, too, when they knew that 4 per cent bonds running thirty years would continue to be issued under the act of 1875 if the House bill should not be concurred in by the Senate.

If the Senate had promptly concurred in this House provision, the hundred million loan for which bids have just been opened would have been made a 3 per cent loan and offered at par to the American people. And the responses made to this 4 per cent loan make it certain that every dollar would have been taken, and the saving to the people in this loan alone would have been at least $80,000,000.

The House, Mr. Chairman, is entitled to a definite answer to the second proposition that it made, that bonds issued under the act of 1875 should be first offered as a popular loan to the American people. The majority of the Senate have struck out that provision of the House bill, and thus has permitted a repetition of the sale of bonds to foreign syndicates at inadequate prices without offering them to the American people.

I take it that the House proposes to insist on these two propositions, and, further, to insist on its third proposition, that when bonds are sold under the act of 1875 the proceeds shall be devoted exclusively to redemption purposes, as provided in the act of 1875, and not to be indirectly used, as they have been practically used during the past two and a half years, to meet deficiencies of revenues.

What has been going on, Mr. Chairman, for the last two and a half years? One hundred and sixty-two million dollars of bonds have been sold, from which has been realized $182,000,000 in gold. One hundred and eighty-two million dollars in greenbacks have been redeemed, and immediately $133,000,000 of the $182,000,000 redeemed have been paid out to meet a deficiency in revenue, and thus made available for a second presentation for redemption.

The House bill proposes to stop that procedure, and to provide that all the proceeds of bonds shall be devoted exclusively to the one purpose of maintaining the redemption fund, and that whenever there shall be a deficiency of revenue that certificates of indebtedness snall be sold, bearing interest not exceeding 3 per cent and payable from revenue within three years. This would have practically separated the reserve or redemption fund from the funds devoted to the payment of current expenses.

Mr. Chairman, the House, I take it, will insist upon all three of its propositions. It will not consent that a bill sent to the Senate bearing upon a distinct subject, to accomplish the three distinct purposes which I have named, shall be returned to this House with every line and every word struck out and an entire measure substituted, not only upon a different subject, but on a subject not having the slightest relation to the three points on which the House asked the concurrence of the Senate.

The propositions contained in the pending measure as it passed the House are so important to a restoration of the Treasury to the sound condition which existed from 1879 to 1893 that the House ought to insist on the action it has already taken.

I might stop here, Mr. Chairman, and not proceed to discuss at all the substitute that has been proposed by the Senate. I might be and every gentleman here might be in favor of every line of the Senate substitute, and yet this House would have a right to demand of the Senate that it should either concur in our action or present an amendment repealing the act of 1875—leaving legislation on another subject to come up in an orderly way. One or the other horn of this dilemma, if the majority of the Senate choose to call it a dilemma, the Senate ought to be required to take. Either authority should be given to reduce the rate of interest and to require public loans, or else the act of 1875 should be repealed.

THE NATIONAL CREDIT.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to stop here. I desire to discuss, as briefly as possible, the character of the substitute which the Senate has presented; a substitute, be it remembered, on an entirely different subject. What is that substitute? It consists of three parts. The last proposition (for I will consider them in inverse order) authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem greenbacks or Treasury notes, at his option, in either standard silver dollars or gold.

Now, what is the object of that proposed legislation? If it does nothing except simply authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, at his option, to select either form of money in redemptions, then it is merely the law as it exists now and has existed for years. But no doubt it will be claimed—and I am not sure but with good reason—that inasmuch as this legislation reaffirms the existing law and omits the parity provision of the act of 1890, it would repeal this provision. Perhaps it was intended to do that. What was that parity provision of the act of 1890 which limited, or at least indicated the direction of the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury? It was the declaration that it is—

> The established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio or such ratio as may be provided by law.

Is it the object of this substitute to repeal the parity provision of the act of 1890 by this legislation, so as to give some basis to the claim that it was intended to mean that if gold and silver coins should part, then the Secretary of the Treasury should pay for redeemed notes in the cheaper money? And is it intended to follow this up with other legislation which will break the parity between gold and silver?

Mr. Chairman, whether that was intended or not, if this substitute should become law there is not a man in this country who has money to loan to the Government but would take alarm if such legislation should be had at this time, fearing that the Government of the United States had reached the point where it desired to break the parity between the two metals, and that therefore this legislation was to be taken as notice to all the world that at an early date it was proposed to have such further legislation as would make our gold and silver coins part company.

For if it is proposed not to have them part company but to maintain silver and gold at a parity—for everybody knows that our standard silver dollars were coined on the account and for the profit of the Government, and are therefore maintained at a parity with gold by limitation of the amount and indirect redemption by receiving them for gold duties—then what would be gained by a declaration which would serve only to increase distrust?

The suggestion that France compels the holders of the French paper currency to sometimes accept silver in part payment at least of notes presented for redemption, and yet preserves the parity of these notes with gold, overlooks the fact that it is not the Government of France that issues circulating notes, but a corporation distinct from the Government, known as the Bank of France, which maintains a coin reserve of nearly six hundred and thirty-four millions (of which nearly three hundred and eighty-five millions is gold) against a note circulation of only six hundred and seventy-five millions, and which as a bank of discount can protect its reserve by raising the rate of discount and other means not available to a government that issues its own notes without any assets except revenue derived from taxation. Moreover the Government of France does not permit the free coinage of silver, and maintains her full legal-tender silver at a parity with gold precisely as the Government of the United States maintains our silver.

There is no doubt of the power of the United States to redeem greenbacks or pay any Government obligations in any kind of money that it chooses, or even to repudiate the entire debt. A Government can not be sued or its assets attached. A Government note or bond is a debt of honor, and the only assurance the holder of a Government note or bond has that he will receive what he or the creditor who sold him such promise loaned to the government, is his confidence in the good faith of the nation which gave it.

The only question for the nation which gave the promise is not one of technical power to discharge the debt in inferior money, for it has that power, but one of honor and good faith. And even this question must be considered in the light of the fact that the life of a nation is not limited like that of an individual to a few brief years, but will probably go on for many generations and centuries. It is certain that any nation will sooner or later come into straits where its reputation for good faith in the payment of its obligations will not only secure for it credit which would have not otherwise been granted, and credit, too, on terms far more advantageous than would have otherwise been possible. Whatever may happen, I feel assured that the people of this country will see to it that every dollar of the money which they have borrowed and for which obligations are now outstanding, all of which has been gold or its equivalent, will be paid in money of equal value to that which we have received. [Applause.]

And when nothing is to be gained by any other course, wisdom, if nothing else, would dictate that we talk very little about expedients which would be regarded by the world as looking to repudiation. For so long as we maintain the policy of preserving the parity between our gold and our silver coin—and we can not have both gold and silver at the same time as money unless we do preserve that parity,—so long as we do preserve it not one farthing is to be gained by forcing upon any unwilling creditor a kind of money which, for any reason, he may distrust.

In fact, if we would drop that kind of talk and speak boldly and honestly of our intention to maintain our good faith, all kinds of money would be accepted without the least question by anyone. Why, sir, I am informed that until 1893 the bondholders accepted, even in payment of bonds, the current currency of the country without any question, in large part because there was no reason to distrust our good faith and our purpose to maintain the two kinds of money at a parity.

THE SILVER DOLLARS IN THE TREASURY.

Mr. Chairman, judging from much that I have heard here and elsewhere, there is an impression that we have in the Treasury of the United States a large mass of silver dollars belonging to the Government that could be used for the purpose of redeeming the greenbacks. But where are they, Mr. Chairman? I have here the report of the Treasury Department for yesterday. How many silver dollars are there in the Treasury? Three hundred and fifty-three million dollars, besides the fund set aside for the redemption of the Treasury notes. What is the condition of that $353,000,000? Three hundred and forty-six million dollars of silver certificates are outstanding against them. Who owns the 346,000,000 silver dollars deposited, represented by $346,000,000 of silver certificates outstanding? Not the Government, but the people of this country; there is scarcely a citizen of the United States who does not own some of them by having in his possession a silver certificate. Only 7,000,000 of silver dollars outside of the fund under the act of 1890 are in the Treasury to-day, belonging to it in such a way as to be made available for the redemption of the greenbacks. Therefore what is proposed is to disturb confidence in this country still more—to create the impression that we propose to repudiate something whether we do or not,—all because of simply $7,000,000; and every one of these silver dollars can be used for other purposes, instead of greenbacks, and thus maintain the confidence which existed from 1879 to 1893.

There is no excuse in the present condition of the Treasury for parading abroad throughout this country again what is already the law, unless you propose to repeal the parity act of 1890 and increase a distrust which already exists. The end of using these $7,000,000 for redemption purposes does not justify the means.

Mr. McRAE. I ask the gentleman to tell us how much silver bullion there is in the Treasury purchased under the act of 1890, and why that should not be coined into silver dollars and used to redeem the Sherman Treasury notes, and thereby to that extent relieve the drain upon the gold reserve?

THE TREASURY BULLION AND THE CERTIFICATE DEVICE.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am coming to that. My friend from Arkansas asks, why not use the silver bullion which was purchased under the act of 1890 by the use of Treasury notes? We are using it every day, gradually and safely, under the operation of the unrepealed provisions of the act of 1890, for the redemption and cancellation of these Treasury notes. But should it be used for the redemption of the greenback? Are you not aware, my friend, that there is a redemption going on every day—a redemption of Treasury notes with silver dollars coined from the fund of silver bullion that was purchased under the act of 1890?

Mr. McRAE. To what extent?

Mr. DINGLEY. More than $18,000,000.

A MEMBER. Nineteen million dollars.

Mr. DINGLEY. Nearly $19,000,000 has been redeemed, and most of it in the past year and a half.

Now, let us consider what the process is that is going on, and going on safely, at the present time. We have in the Treasury as a redemption fund under the act of 1890 silver bullion that cost $124,000,000 and $13,000,000 of coined silver dollars, against one hundred and thirty-seven millions of Treasury notes. Under that act it is provided that this silver bullion shall be coined as fast as it may be required for the redemption and cancellation of Treasury notes that may be presented for redemption in silver dollars. How does it happen that while this volume of Treasury notes was originally over $155,000,000 it is to-day only $137,000,000? There is going on a process of redemption and cancellation of Treasury notes by the substitution of silver certificates, gradually and safely, as business demands. This comes under a provision of the act of 1890, which provides that the volume of outstanding Treasury notes shall at no time exceed the silver dollars coined from the bullion purchased under this act and the cost of the uncoined bullion; so that when a Treasury note is redeemed in silver it must be immediately canceled, as the silver dollar or silver certificate representing the silver dollar goes into circulation in its place.

Now, this fund of silver is being constantly used in this way. Holders of Treasury notes are voluntarily presenting them every day at the Treasury for redemption in silver dollars. Why? Because the policy of the Treasury Department is to gradually place the smaller denominations of our paper money in silver certificates. Whenever it is desired to obtain a larger amount of ones, twos, or fives, the way in which they can be most speedily obtained is to ask for the redemption of the larger denominations of Treasury notes in silver dollars, and the immediate issue, on the deposit of those, of silver certificates in the denominations of ones, twos, and fives.

Now, when this process is going on safely, why propose by one bold stroke to increase rapidly and illegitimately the distrust that exists in this country and to put into circulation a larger volume of these notes than can be used in the ordinary transactions of business, causing them at once to be presented at our custom-houses for the payment of customs duties. What is gained by such a process? If you force these notes out quickly, as proposed by the provision of the Senate bill, every dollar of them will within six months be back, being paid in for customs duties in lieu of gold. Then gentlemen will wonder why we do not receive more gold from customs duties.

If, on the contrary, the act of 1890 continues to be executed as it is being executed to-day, within a comparatively few years, as business revives, every dollar of the $124,000,000 of silver bullion that is now in the Treasury belonging to that fund will have been coined and used in redeeming and canceling Treasury notes, in lieu of which will have gone out silver certificates, gradually as business desires them, and whatever profit may have accrued from the coinage will have been covered into the Treasury. That is the safe way of using the bullion in the Treasury and converting it into money and at the same time eliminating the Treasury notes from our currency.

Now, what is proposed by this measure which has come from the Senate? It is proposed to make one grand grab; to violate the good faith pledged by the act of 1890, and alarm the business public. But what is really proposed? Look for a moment at it. It proposes to direct the issue at once of about $40,000,000 of silver certificates, representing, as it is said, the seigniorage or profit that would accrue after the $124,000,000 of silver bullion is coined—although not a dollar of it has been coined. Now, what is a silver certificate? Take one out of your pocket, if you please, and read it. "This certifies that there have been deposited in the Treasury of the United States" $5, $2, or $1, as the case may be, "payable to the bearer (or holder) of the certificate on demand."

Now, what does the Senate substitute propose? It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates certifying that $40,000,000 silver dollars have been deposited in the Treasury for their redemption, when, as a matter of fact, there has not been one dollar deposited or even coined. Why, such a proposition has never before been heard of in finance outside of the Congress of the United States. [Laughter.] Direct your Secretary of the Treasury to certify to a falsehood, and then wonder why anybody distrusts the good faith of the Government of the United States!

But what is gained? If you will only consider a moment, and wait, and allow the act of 1890 to work its own salvation, you will have obtained and covered into the Treasury every dollar of the seigniorage or profit, and done it without violating the good faith of the nation and in a way that will not disturb public confidence. The road of good faith is straightforward in this matter; the road of bad faith is tortuous. Honesty, Mr. Chairman, straightforward dealing, is not only the right thing but is good policy for a nation as well as an individual.

I am sure that the House, when it comes to consider what is proposed to be accomplished here, will see that the proposition can only increase the distrust that already exists, and will make the road to recovery longer and more difficult. But even if we should concur in the Senate's proposition, how would it help us in the redemption of the greenbacks? Will some gentleman please tell me how the Senate provision, which directs that silver certificates, which are to be issued on a pretense that they represent deposited dollars not yet coined, shall be used in meeting current expenditures, not devoted to redemption purposes—and this, let me say, is the reply to the gentleman who asked a few moments ago, "Why not use the $124,000,000 of silver bullion which was purchased under the act of 1890 to redeem greenbacks and Treasury notes?"—will some gentleman please tell me how this provision can add anything to the redemption fund?

Mr. TERRY. I understand you to make the point that if the certificates are issued now there would be no silver dollars to meet them?

Mr. DINGLEY. There would be no silver dollars that had been deposited as against certificates issued in this way.

Mr. TERRY. I understand that; but do you make the point that if a silver certificate were issued, and the holder should take it to the Treasury for redemption, and demand his silver dollar, that he could not find a dollar there?

Mr. DINGLEY. If he found any he would have to take somebody else's dollar——

Mr. TERRY. Now right at that point——

Mr. DINGLEY. I must decline to yield, as my time is rapidly passing. I say that we have 346,000,000 of silver dollars in the Treasury, against which there already exists $346,000,000 of silver certificates, certifying that these dollars have been deposited to their credit—silver dollars which do not belong to the Government, but to the holders of the certificates; and if any more silver certificates are issued without depositing new silver dollars to represent them they are based upon a fund that does not exist.

Mr. Chairman, it is said that although nothing will come for greenback-redemption purposes, either from the silver dollars that could be availed of to-day in the Treasury or from the fund which remains as against the Treasury notes, purchased by the issue of Treasury notes, yet, somehow or other, by the adoption of free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 we will furnish a fund for redemption. How, pray? What is the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1? It is authorizing the individual owner of silver to go to our mints and have there 371¼ grains of fine silver converted into a silver dollar at the expense of the Government. And who gets the dollar? The owner of the silver bullion gets it—a silver dollar for every 50 cents' worth of silver so long as the parity is preserved—and the Government gets not a cent of it. How are you going to get silver dollars for the greenback-redemption fund out of the free coinage of silver? The Government gets nothing by such coinage. It loses, on the contrary, the cost of coinage, whatever it may be. Even with such coinage, the only way the Government can get such silver dollars for its greenback-redemption fund is by issuing bonds to buy them, and if silver and gold are to be maintained at a parity, certainly the Government will have to pay the same for coined silver as for gold.

Where, then, is the advantage to the Government and to the people who do not own silver bullion? It is replied that it will be found in the restoration of silver to its former place as a yokefellow of gold, by which this country will have both gold and silver freely coined and permanently concurrently in circulation as the money of the people, or, in other words, full bimetallism.

If it be true that opening of the mints of this country alone to the free and unlimited coinage of private silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 would give this country the permanent concurrent coinage and circulation of both gold and silver as money, which is the popular understanding of the meaning of bimetallism, then such coinage would be welcomed.

SOME CONCEDED PRINCIPLES.

But what is the evidence, Mr. Chairman, that the opening of the mints of this country to the free and unlimited coinage of private silver on the basis of regarding 16 ounces of silver the equivalent in coinage of 1 ounce of gold would result in bringing gold as well as silver to be coined and permanently concurrently circulated, when in every market of the world 32 ounces of silver is now the equivalent of 1 ounce of gold?

It must be conceded that under free and unlimited coinage of private silver bullion after a sufficient time had elapsed to give an opportunity to get into full operation, there could be no material difference in market value between 371¼ grains of fine silver in the form of bullion before coinage and 371¼ grains of silver coined into a standard silver dollar; for no owner of silver, here or abroad, would sell 371¼ grains of silver bullion materially less than he could dispose of a silver dollar coined from such silver, when he could have his bullion converted into such dollar without cost to himself. This is exactly what is found to be the case under the free and unlimited coinage of gold. The gold bullion required to mint a gold dollar is worth the same before coinage as after.

It follows from this that gold would not be brought to our mints for coinage on the basis of regarding 1 ounce of gold as the equivalent in coinage of only 16 ounces of silver unless such opening should change the absolute and relative value of gold and silver bullion in the markets of the world from the ratio of 32 to 1, as now exists, to the ratio of 16 to 1; or, in other words, should practically double the value of silver as measured in gold. For unless this miraculous change in relative value should be worked by opening the mints of this country alone, gold would not be taken to our mints for coinage, and even that already coined would be withdrawn from use as money, and both gold bullion and coined gold would become merchandise and be sold and exported as such. In other words, we should be left with only silver as our metallic full legal-tender money and should become a silver monometallic nation on a silver basis.

THE REAL ISSUE.

Mr. Chairman, the issue between those who hold that free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 by this country alone would result in giving us the permanent concurrent coinage and circulation of gold and silver—for I am not addressing myself to those who desire silver monometallism—is thus narrowed down to a consideration of the question as to whether such coinage would so change the relative value of gold and silver in every market of the world as to make 16 ounces of silver the equivalent in value or purchasing power of 1 ounce of gold, when now it requires 32 ounces of silver to be such equivalent. Those who favor such coinage must demonstrate that this marvelous change would be wrought by it before they can reasonably ask the people of this country to take the enormous risk of its failure.

I trust, therefore, that in the discussion which is now opened those who advocate the adoption of the policy of opening the mints of this country alone to the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 will not spend their time in mere assertions and declamation about the importance of bimetallism, which the country understands to mean the permanent concurrent coinage and circulation of both gold and silver full legal-tender money, and the disadvantages of monometallism, but will present to the House and country the grounds on which they assume that such coinage would result in giving us such bimetallism rather than silver monometallism.

For myself, I never was more confident of any fact in finance than I am that such coinage of silver as is proposed would speedily drive gold from its use as money in this country and leave us with nothing but silver—in other words, silver monometallism—precisely as such a policy has resulted in Mexico. I shall listen attentively and with a receptive mind to any facts and arguments which may be adduced to maintain otherwise, for the reason that I heartily welcome the use of silver as full legal-tender money in any manner and to any extent which will preserve the parity of gold and silver and give us both metals as our property money. By the action of our Government in the past, by the declarations of both the great political parties in 1892, and by the enactment of a law with but few dissenting votes by the last Congress, we have declared our purpose to steadily seek the concurrence of a sufficient number of leading commercial nations in an international agreement for the free coinage of silver which would make permanent full bimetallism possible. Under that law we are standing to-day in the attitude of asking other countries to cooperate with us in this movement.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. What is the condition of the people of Mexico to-day?

Mr. DINGLEY. I am not discussing at present the question as to what would be the results of silver monometallism. I am discussing simply the question as to whether with free coinage of silver in this country alone we can secure the concurrent circulation of both silver and gold. I am not discussing the question of whether it would be wise to drive out gold and have nothing but silver, which the gentleman wants to discuss. That is another question.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Then, may I ask the gentleman if I am to understand from his argument, and I do not wish to put a wrong interpretation on it, he would rather have gold monometallism and distress than prosperity and silver monometallism?

Mr. DINGLEY. Whatever impairment of prosperity there may be here from causes very different from what my friend assumes, even the adversity of the United States is prosperity such as Mexico never dreamed of.

Let it be kept steadily in mind, however, while we are steadily looking to a solution of this problem by an international agreement, the only way in which, in my judgment, full bimetallism can be secured and maintained, that what we, as well as France, now have—for France and the United States are maintaining tentatively precisely the same coinage policy—is not gold monometal-lism, but limited bimetallism, under which we carry about five hundred millions of silver, nearly four hundred and twenty-five millions of which is full legal tender, and about five hundred and seventy-five millions is gold, but every dollar, together with every dollar of our paper, maintained at a parity of value.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does not the gentleman believe that it would be safe for the Government to coin at once all the silver bullion remaining in the Treasury?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have given my reasons for entertaining the belief that so large coinage at once would increase the distrust; but to issue silver certificates on the profit of coinage not yet undertaken would be in the highest degree unwise.

Mr. TERRY. Did we have bimetallism under the act of 1792?

Mr. DINGLEY. We had an approach to it.

Mr. TERRY. We did not have concurrent circulation then, did we?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, we had it part of the time, and the variation never exceeded 2 per cent. But I must decline to take up time in answering questions that are outside of the particular point I am discussing, because if gentlemen concede that we are not to have concurrent circulation of the two metals under 16 to 1 free coinage, then that is all I am arguing. I think we should have silver monometallism as the result of free coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1 by this country alone. That is all I am endeavoring to demonstrate, and if that is admitted, then my object is secured.

THE ARGUMENTS FOR 16 TO 1 FREE COINAGE.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to examine as briefly as may be the arguments presented by those who hold that the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 will give this country full bimetallism, or the concurrent coinage and circulation of gold and silver as full legal tender money.

The argument on which the friends of 16 to 1 free silver seem to more especially rest is that the opening of our mints to such coinage will create an unlimited demand for silver at a fixed price of $1.29 per ounce—the price demanded by this ratio—and this would make the market price of silver bullion in every market of the world.

This would be the case if it were true that free coinage by this country alone would create an unlimited demand for silver at the fixed price of $1.29 per ounce. The fallacy of the whole argument becomes apparent when it is considered that the demand for silver by our mints alone would not be unlimited, but restricted to the demand of purchasers of silver dollars, and that the price received by the owner of silver for each 371¼ grains is not a fixed price, but what a stamped standard silver dollar will exchange for in the markets under free and unlimited coinage. Those who accept this argument unconsciously accept the "fiat" idea that whatever the Government stamps $1 is thereby given an exchange value to that amount, regardless of its intrinsic value or its redeemable promise to pay such value—a theory which went down in disgrace under our greenback experience until specie redemption was established in 1879.

An absurd exaggeration of the theory of the bimetallic tie, as held by the scientific advocates of bimetallism, and in which I concur, has been adopted by some of the advocates of 16 to 1 free silver, to which I desire to refer. This theory holds that where the unit is measured in two metals at their commercial ratio at the time this ratio is fixed, then when one metal begins to rise there is an increased demand for the other metal which tends to restore the equilibrium so long as the conditions of production of either metal remain substantially the same. But no scientific advocate of bimetallism ever held that this alternating demand could successfully operate except within narrow limits and when the coinage ratio had been established at the commercial ratio.

It must be evident that the bimetallic tie is very weak when only a single nation has opened its mints, and that its power rapidly increases as the number of nations uniting in maintaining a common coinage ratio is enlarged. It is for this reason that international free coinage of silver becomes the hope and safety of full bimetallism, while independent free coinage, especially at a ratio widely different from the commercial ratio, must inevitably lead to disorder and silver monometallism.

Again, it is contended that the sole cause of the decline of silver was the closing of the mints of Europe and of the United States to its free coinage, and that if the mints of the United States shall be reopened immediately silver will assume its old relative value to gold.

But do not those who present this argument see that even if it be conceded that the sole cause of the decline of silver has been the closing of the mints of Europe and of the United States to its free coinage, the remedy would be not the opening of the mints of this country alone, but the opening of the mints of Europe also—in other words, international free coinage.

THE EXAMPLE OF FRANCE.

Mr. Chairman, it is also argued with great confidence that the poen mints of France alone maintained the relative value of gold and silver at the ratio of near 15½ to 1 for the first seventy-four years of this century, and therefore that the opening of the mints of the United States alone to the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 would also change the commercial ratio of silver and gold bullion to 16 to 1, notwithstanding it is now 32 to 1.

It is sufficient to say in reply that when France adopted the coinage ratio of 15½ to 1 this was the commercial ratio of silver and gold bullion; that not only France, but every country in Europe maintained substantially the same coinage ratio; that during the first sixty years of this century the annual production of silver never rose above 29,000,000 ounces per annum; and that soon after 1865 the annual production of silver began to rise abnormally, reaching 55,000,000 ounces in 1874, when not only France, but the other countries of the Latin Union, to wit, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, and Greece, which had joined France in opening their mints to silver nine years before, were forced to close them, and have kept them closed against the free coinage of silver ever since.

Surely what France, aided by the other countries of the Latin Union, was unable to do in the face of the rise in the annual production of silver from 29,000,000 to 55,000,000 ounces, and a decline of only 3 cents per ounce in the price of silver, it would be absurd to expect the United States could do single-handed in the face of a rise of the annual production of silver from 55,000,000 ounces in 1874 to 160,000,000 in 1893, and a decline of 50 cents per ounce in its price.

THE OVERSHADOWING CAUSE OF SILVER DECLINE.

It is this abnormal increase in the production of silver in the face of a constantly declining price—indicating beyond question such a change in the conditions of mining that has greatly reduced the cost of producing silver, after making due allowance for the effect of the closing of European mints to silver—that has been the chief factor in causing the remarkable decline of silver in the past twenty-two years; and unless these conditions of silver production materially change, it is idle to claim that if the mints of the United States could be opened to the free coinage of silver on the basis of 16 to 1, the old relative value of silver and gold which existed before these new conditions came in would be restored.

The assertion so frequently made that the mere legislative suspension in 1873 of a law authorizing the free coinage of silver caused the decline of silver, when for twelve years prior to that time almost no silver had been coined by our mints for circulation, affords a most remarkable illustration of the potency of a persistent iteration of an absurdity.

The only way, Mr. Chairman, in which the closing or opening of mints to the coinage of silver can bring about a rise or fall of the metal is through a diminution or an increase of the demand for silver bullion. It is significant in this connection to recall that the United States has used five times as much silver as money in the seventeen years since 1878 as it used in the first seventy years of the existence of this Government under the Constitution. And it is worthy of note also, as an indication of the comparatively small influence of a demand for silver by the United States alone, that notwithstanding this country purchased, between 1890 and 1893, 54,000,000 ounces of silver per annum—substantially the American product, and one-third of the product of the world—yet after a temporary boom silver began to fall more rapidly than before, undoubtedly for the reason that the small increase of price at first so increased the profits of silver mining as to stimulate production more than ever.

The fact must not be overlooked also that while it is probable that the value of gold, which had declined somewhat under the large Californian and Australian production from 1850 to 1865, rose again as the production declined after 1865, yet since 1890 the increase of production has been greater than ever before, rising from $118,000,000 in 1870 to $205,000,000 in 1895, with the probability that the production this year will reach $250,000,000, which is almost twice the production of any year of the Californian period.

THE "DOLLAR OF THE FATHERS."

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to say that nothing can be more illogical and mischievous than the constant assertions which are being made, if men would but stop to think, about restoring what they call the dollar, the silver dollar of "the Fathers." What do you mean by that? Do you mean to say that the coinage ratio of 16 to 1 is a Divine ordination? Do you mean to say that it is something that has been established by the Divine will and is to be continued for all time? What do you mean? Why, when Christopher Columbus discovered America 10½ ounces of silver was the equivalent of 1 ounce of gold, and that being the commercial ratio, the coinage ratio was made the same in those countries which maintained the two metals at a parity.

Did the fathers in 1792 proceed to say, "Oh, let us restore the dollar of Christopher Columbus"? [Laughter.] "Let us adopt a ratio of 10½ to 1 in our coinage; because when the venerable Christopher discovered this country that was the ratio of Divine ordination." [Laughter.] They did not do anything of the kind. They treated the subject as common-sense business men; and Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, proceeded to do what? From an investigation in every market of the world he ascertained what the commercial ratio of gold and silver was, and he found that his investigation showed that it was 15 to 1.

So the fathers adopted that ratio. In other words, they adopted the dollar unit, and measured this unit in the two metals at a ratio of 15 to 1 by weight, on the supposition that this was the commercial ratio, and therefore that both would be the same. What took place? In process of time it was discovered that this ratio that had been established departed slightly, less than 2 per cent, from the commercial ratio, and that after a time very little gold (gold being undervalued) came to the mint. So in 1834 the sons of the grandfathers came forward and changed the ratio to 16 to 1, supposing that to be the then commercial ratio. They made a mistake of a very small fraction and undervalued silver. The result was that by 1840 very little silver was brought to the mint; and in 1853 we were obliged to reduce the weight of silver in our fractional silver coins to prevent them from going out of circulation and into the melting pots.

So it seems that "the fathers" of that day did not conceive the notion that there was a divinely ordained ratio of any kind. In adopting a ratio they were simply following the commercial ratio, and, so long as the commercial ratio varied but slightly, the bimetallic tie held the two metals together. There was less than $15,000,000 of full legal-tender silver in circulation in 1860. Less than $15,000,000! Simply from the fact that we had undervalued silver by our ratio of 16 to 1. From 1862 to 1873 not a dollar of either gold or silver was in circulation as money. Why? Simply for the reason that we had established another legal-tender dollar, the greenback, which depreciated, and cheaper money always drives out the more valuable. That is sometimes called Gresham's law, but it is simply the law of business common sense.

Mr. McMILLIN. If it will not interrupt the distinguished gentleman, I would like to ask him one question at this point. If I understand his argument the whole tenor of it is that the increased production of silver made necessary the action taken by the nations of the world against the coinage of silver.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have not said that. I have not undertaken to say what influenced Germany. There are different theories about it, and I can not decide between them. But we do know that at the time Germany closed her mints to the free coinage of silver the silver dollar was worth 3 cents more than the gold in the gold dollar, and that is a sufficient answer to the assumption so often made that some people who were creditors procured in 1873 the suspension of the coinage of silver in this country in order to increase the value of their loans. If they were going to do that I should think they would have made silver the metal to be coined and would have demonetized gold.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman, in this connection, whether it is not true that at the time of the passage of the demonetization act of 1873 silver was still at a premium, as it was when Germany demonetized it?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly. But the premium was very small, and in 1874, when the Latin Union closed their mints, silver had declined nearly three cents.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then the depreciated value of silver could not have been the cause of its demonetization.

Mr. DINGLEY. In 1873—of course not.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. Did not Germany go to the gold standard because of the forty-seven different kinds of silver money that existed in that country?

MEXICO AS AN OBJECT LESSON.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, we need not, however, rest the case on reason and past experience alone, for we have at our doors an object lesson of the results of 16½ to 1 equal and unlimited coinage in Mexico. For years Mexico has tried such coinage. She avoided what is facetiously called "the crime of 1873." Her laws to-day permit the coinage of both silver and gold at the ratio of 16½ to 1, and yet not a dollar of gold is taken to her mints or is found in use as money. She has only silver as her metallic money, and is to-day a silver monometallic country. Notwithstanding she coins a large amount of silver—$29,000,000 in 1893—for the reason that her coins have been for many years current in China, thus making her experiment that of 400,000,000 of people, yet Mexico's open mints and Mexico's demand for silver do not seem to have the slightest effect in raising the price of silver or preventing its fall.

THE OPINION OF SCIENTIFIC BIMETALLISTS.

There is not a scientific bimetallist outside of politics in the whole world who believes that under the present conditions any country in the world can establish, and open its mints at the ratio of 16 to 1, and secure the concurrent coinage and permanent concurrent circulation of the two metals. In the French Chamber of Deputies last winter, when this question was discussed, the French minister of finance declared that France stands ready, when a sufficient combination is made among the nations of the world to show that such a ratio can be maintained, to open her mints to free coinage; and when a member of the Chamber of Deputies further questioned the minister of finance, he replied that France was ready to unite in any movement that gave promise of bringing the two metals together as yokefellows under free coinage; but, added the French minister, it is not in the power of France alone nor in the power of the United States alone to secure full bimetallism unless a sufficient number of commercial nations shall enter into the combination to so increase the demand for silver as to bring the two together on a ratio that shall take into account the existing situation.

Let us take up this question as a practical and scientific one, and, while temporarily using all the silver we can carry in parity, seek to secure such concurrence of nations as will bring about permanent bimetallism that will give us both gold and silver as our money. I am with you heart and hand in that effort, but I can not consent as a representative of the American people, having no personal interest at stake in this matter one way or the other except the common interest of a citizen of the United States—I can not consent to shut my eyes to facts that every intelligent man, if he will only open his eyes and observe them, must take into careful consideration.

Let us assume that the closing of the mints of Europe has had some effect in causing the depreciation of silver; but let us concede that the increased production of silver at a constantly reduced price has had more effect. Let us consider this question in a business way and then we shall not err. I know of no question that it is more dangerous to commit to the stormy and changing sea of politics than this question of money; and I deplore beyond expression that such a question as this should have been dragged into ward caucuses and conventions and treated on a purely partisan and political basis.

Mr. Chairman, while the people of this country generally desire to secure a restoration of full bimetallism whenever it can be accomplished, and maintain the parity of the two kinds of money, yet I believe that our people never will consent to any policy which it is believed will cause the two metals to separate, will drive out gold and make us a silver monometallic country. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

Mr. WHEELER obtained the floor.

Mr. CRISP. Before the gentleman from Alabama begins his remarks, I want to give notice, in response to the notice given by the gentleman from Maine, that at the end of this debate I shall move that the House concur in the Senate amendments. I merely make this announcement so that it may be a basis of the argument which may be made on that side of the question.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before moving that the committee rise, I wish to say that there are many gentlemen who desire to make remarks upon some phases of the question before us, and it has been thought wise that we should have, during the time of this general discussion, upon which I will not at present undertake to fix any limit, though I hope we may see our way clear to do so to-morrow—it has been thought best that there should be evening sessions for discussion only. There are gentlemen who are ready to speak in the evening——

Mr. CRISP. To-night?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have understood there are gentlemen ready to speak to-night. Of course we do not expect that the gentleman from Georgia will be ready to go on to-night.

Mr. CRISP. It seems to me that the gentleman ought to have suggested this arrangement earlier in the day if he proposes it to take effect to-night. I do not know of anyone who will be ready to speak to-night.

Mr. DINGLEY. There are three hours that might be occupied in debate this evening; and if not occupied, some gentlemen who desire to speak must inevitably lose their opportunity, because this debate can not be prolonged to a very great extent.

Mr. CRISP. I think the gentleman from Maine does not realize how unjust his suggestion is. He has himself occupied nearly two hours. If when the debate began he had suggested that there would be a session for debate this evening, gentlemen would have been prepared to go on to-night. But it is now within five minutes of 5 o'clock, and gentlemen can not be expected to be ready.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands there are some gentlemen who are ready to speak this evening.

Mr. DINGLEY. In view of the suggestion of the Chair, it seems to me that gentlemen who desire to speak this evening ought to have the opportunity to do so. I think the time ought to be occupied.

Mr. JOHNSON of California addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I rise because I have a right to rise as a member of this body. I rise to speak upon this proposition to close debate. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman wishes to be heard upon that proposition, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in reply to the remark of the gentleman from Maine that he did not think general debate on this question would be allowed much beyond to-morrow——

Mr. DINGLEY. I did not say that.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I wish to say that for one I protest against any such proposition.

Mr. DINGLEY. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. This is the most important question that can come before us; and there are many of us who desire the opportunity to debate it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I simply said I hoped we should be able to determine to-morrow when the debate will close.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Maine might accomplish his object by giving notice that there will be evening sessions for debate, beginning with to-morrow evening.

Mr. BRUMM. That would be fairer.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think it has been understood there would be evening sessions on this bill. It is my desire that we may have evening sessions for debate, and a number of gentlemen have said to the Chairman that they would be ready to speak in the evening.

Now, the Chairman informs me that other gentlemen are ready to proceed to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. There are some gentlemen who have expressed a desire to speak to-night.

Mr. DINGLEY. That being the case, I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. BRUMM. Before that, if the gentleman will permit me, there are a number of amendments, as I understand, that will be offered when the proper time comes to the bill, and I ask leave that they may be offered now, simply for information, and printed in the RECORD, so that members may have them before them in discussing the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no objection to the printing of the amendments for information in the RECORD, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask unanimous consent, then, that members who may desire to offer amendments may have them printed in the RECORD for the information of the House, so that they may be before the members as the debate proceeds.

Mr. DINGLEY. Merely for information, of course.

Mr. BRUMM. Certainly; merely for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that amendments to be proposed to the bill may be printed in the RECORD for information?

There was no objection.

Under the consent given, Mr. BRUMM submitted the following as an amendment to be proposed to the bill:

At the end of line 16, section 2, insert:

"Provided, That when the commercial value of either gold or silver bullion shall be less than the coinage value of the same, then the seigniorage upon all coinage of gold or silver bullion shall be retained by the United States equal in amount to the difference between the coinage value and the commercial value of the same when presented at the mint."

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire submitted the following amendment, to be offered at the proper time:

Strike out all after the enacting clause in the bill and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase, from time to time, at the market price thereof, not exceeding $1 for 371.25 grains of fine silver, such quantities of silver bullion which is the product of the mines of the United States as its mints can coin in connection with its other necessary coinage, and to pay for the same with the coined silver of the United States, and a sufficient number of silver dollars to carry into effect the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated, out of any of the coined silver in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and for this purpose, and to supply any deficiency in the coined silver held by the Treasury, caused by the payments herein authorized, the Secretary of the Treasury may coin the whole or any part of the silver bullion owned by the United States.

"SEC. 2. That upon the request of the party selling the said silver bullion the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, may pay for the said bullion in silver certificates authorized by the act of February 28, 1878, as amended by the act of March 3, 1887, and the coined silver dollars in lieu of which the certificates are paid shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand.

"SEC. 3. That no silver bullion shall be purchased under the provisions of this act unless the owner thereof shall prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that it is wholly the product of the mines of the United States.

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of the preceding sections of this act to be coined into silver dollars, of the weight and fineness now provided by law, as rapidly as the capacity and general business of the mints will permit, and if at any time the quantity of such bullion, purchased as aforesaid, shall be equal to the ordinary mint capacity for six months, no more silver bullion shall be purchased until the bullion on hand shall have been reduced below such limit.

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, and as frequently as once a month, shall cancel and destroy of the United States notes in the Treasury issued under the authority of the acts of February 25, 1862, July 11, 1862, and March 3, 1863, or of the Treasury notes issued under the authority of the act of July 14, 1890, an amount equal to the silver dollars coined under the authority of this act for which notes had not previously been canceled, and no new notes shall be issued to take the place of the notes thus destroyed. Whenever the face value of the said notes in the Treasury is less than $25,000,000, none of the said notes shall be used or paid for any purpose, but when paid into the Treasury shall be held for cancellation as is herein provided, and the coinage of silver dollars shall in no month exceed the value of said notes awaiting cancellation.

"SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall first cancel all of the said notes in the Treasury of the denomination of $5 or less, and shall not issue any new notes of a less denomination than $10 to take the place of any of those destroyed because worn or mutilated.

"SEC. 7. That hereafter no notes of a less denomination than $10 shall be issued to or by any national bank.

"SEC. 8. That nothing herein contained shall be held to limit or prevent the issuing of silver certificates on the silver dollars coined under this act. Such issues are hereby expressly authorized in the manner now provided by law, and the Secretary of the Treasury may issue them in such denominations, not less than $1, as he may deem most convenient and appropriate for circulation.

"SEC. 9. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

"SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect sixty days from and after its passage."

Mr. SPALDING submitted the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That a monetary commission be, and the same is hereby, constituted, to consist of 21 members, who shall be appointed as follows: Seven members shall be appointed by the President of the United States, 7 members by the Senate of the United States, and 7 members by the House of Representatives of the United States. The persons appointed to this commission shall be selected for their familiarity and well-known ability in monetary matters and shall be as far as possible nonpolitical.

"It shall be the duty of said commission, when appointed, to inquire into the whole subject-matter of coinage, ratios, currency schemes, and such other subjects which directly or indirectly affect the monetary affairs of the United States, and said commission is hereby advised and instructed to use their utmost endeavors to procure reliable information on this subject.

Said commission shall sit from time to time, after the passage of this act, until the 1st of December, 1896, at such times and places as they shall elect, and shall as soon as possible after the sitting of Congress in December, 1896, submit a report of their investigations to Congress, with such recommendations and observations as they may deem fit and proper.

The amount of $100,000 is hereby appropriated out of the funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of said commission.

Mr. TOWNE submitted the following amendments:

Amend section 1 of the Senate amendment by striking out the words "passage of this act," in line one, and insert the words "1st day of January, 1899," and by adding at the end of said section the following: "Provided, That the number of grains of standard silver, nine-tenths fine, contained in each dollar herein authorized to be coined may be changed before this act goes into effect, as hereinafter provided."

Strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That the President is hereby requested and authorized immediately to extend to such of the leading commercial nations as have closed their mints to the free coinage of silver an invitation to send commissioners to meet, as early as practicable and at some convenient place, five commissioners to be named by the President on behalf of the United States, of which commissioners he shall appoint not more than two from any one political party, for the purpose of agreeing upon a ratio at which the free and equal coinage of both gold and silver shall be authorized by the several nations becoming parties to such agreement; and that upon the report of said commissioners of such an agreement, the President shall make proclamation of the fact and of the ratio of coinage so agreed upon, and thereupon the first section of this act shall be deemed to be so changed as to authorize the number of grains of silver in the dollar therein provided for to be fixed at the number properly expressive of such ratio. The sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this section."

Amend by striking out sections 1 and 2 and inserting the following:

"SECTION 1. That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to receive at any United States mint, from any citizen of the United States, silver bullion of standard fineness, and coin the same into silver dollars of 412.5 grains each, which shall be full legal tender for all debts, public and private. The seigniorage on the said bullion shall belong to the United States, and shall be the difference between the coinage value thereof and the market price of the bullion in New York on the day the deposit is made, and all expenditures for coinage done under the provisions of this act shall be paid out of said seigniorage; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to the depositors of such bullion either standard silver dollars equal in amount to the price thereof as aforesaid, or Treasury notes of convenient denominations promising to pay an equivalent number of dollars."

To substitute for the Senate amendment the following:

"SECTION 1. That any person may deposit for coinage in any mint of the United States gold bullion or silver bullion not less than $50 in value, and sufficiently pure not to require refining before being coined; and the same shall be coined free of charge, the gold into the coins authorized by existing law, and the silver into dollars containing fifteen and a half times as many grains of pure silver as there are grains of pure gold in the gold dollar, and nine-tenths fine, being 359.91 grains of pure silver and 39.99 grains of alloy, a total of 399.9 grains of standard silver.

SEC. 2. Said depositor, in exchange for such bullion, shall receive, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury, either coins similar to those into which the metal deposited is coined, or Treasury notes of convenient denominations promising to pay an equivalent number of dollars, which notes upon presentation for redemption shall be payable in either gold or silver coin, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury. The gold coins, silver dollars, and Treasury notes herein provided for shall be full legal tender for all debts, public and private. The existing silver dollars shall be retired and recoined according to the ratio herein provided, the profits accruing therefrom to be applied to the expenses of maintaining the mints.

SEC. 3. This law shall become operative when the Governments of France and Germany shall have adopted laws under which gold and silver, at the ratio of 1 to 15½, shall have equal access to their mints, and the full legal-tender function be conferred upon the gold and principal silver coins; and upon the passage of such laws by said Governments of France and Germany, the President of the United States shall make proclamation of the fact, and thereupon this law shall take effect and be in force.

Mr. CORLISS submitted the following proposed amendment to the bill:

Refer the bill, with Senate amendments, to the Committee on Banking and Currency, with instructions to prepare and submit to the House a bill that shall provide a currency for the United States to be composed of both gold and silver as standard money, without regard to the currency laws of any other nation, and with such restrictions and under such provisions as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The Speaker accordingly resumed the chair, and Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration House bill No. 2904, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that it has been the understanding that there would be evening sessions for debate to-day and to-morrow at least; and while I will move presently that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening, I shall ask that the evening session begin to-morrow at 7.30, in order that gentlemen who desire to speak may have an opportunity to do so and be in readiness.

Mr. CRISP. Will my friend from Maine, in the same connection—as it may relieve the pressure somewhat—also ask unanimous consent that gentlemen be permitted to print remarks in the RECORD, for, say, a period of ten days, on this question?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will do so. I ask unanimous consent, also, that gentlemen may be permitted to print in the RECORD speeches on this question for the period of ten days, with the understanding that they shall be such speeches as would ordinarily be delivered, if an opportunity had occurred, on the floor of the House, and not be a compilation of chapters from books and essays, and from magazines, which shall be excluded under this consent. I make this suggestion because once before, when similar consent was given, members immediately began to reprint in the RECORD all the books in the library. [Laughter.] With the understanding, therefore, that it is to be such speeches as may ordinarily be delivered in the House, with such extracts as are usually read and belong to a speech, and not chapters of books or magazines and matters of that kind, I make the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. I now ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock, the evening session to be for debate only.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent also that the debate take place in the House to-night as in Committee of the Whole—the general debate only.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 173) to provide American registers for the barks Minde and Johan Ludwig; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 103) to authorize the Attorney-General to transfer to William Henry Clifford a portrait of the late Mr. Justice Clifford, now in the Department of Justice.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1547) to extend the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court of appeals, eighth circuit, over certain suits now pending therein on appeal and writ of error from the United States court in the Indian Territory;

A bill (S. 708) to amend section 4 of an act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (S. R. 23) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to use a portion of the appropriation for new iron roof for foundry at navy-yard, Washington, D. C., in the act entitled, "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," for repairs to the walls of said foundry.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Before announcing the recess, the Chair desires to suggest the passage of an order which the Chair will read:

Ordered, That the bill (H. R. 5210) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, be printed as it passed to be engrossed and was recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

This request was made, there being some doubt whether it could be properly printed under the rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KULP, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LEISENRING, indefinitely, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. PAYNE to preside as Speaker pro tempore during the session of this evening; and then (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House was declared in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by Mr. PAYNE as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The special order to-night is the bill H. R. 2904, and the session is limited to general debate only. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2904) to restore the coinage of silver dollars, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] for thirty minutes.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I very much dislike to take the floor so early this evening, especially as I did not expect it and have made no ar rangements for a discussion. However, it is well known that this discussion is not intended to change votes for or against this measure. Every Representative on this floor was tabulated for or against this overshadowing question before he took his oath of office. The mere fact that the bonding and gold-standard interests have an overwhelming majority in this House is not direct evidence that the great majority of the American people whom we are presumed to represent are in accord with this view. The Government, in fact, has gotten away from the people and political manipulation and false issues have secured Representatives for the gold standard for many bimetallic constituencies. As the silver question has been, is being, and will be thoroughly discussed in all of its phases, I will devote the most of the short time allotted to me to the history of parties and the objects of this contest. It seems to me that on all occasions the history and aims of the parties destroying a part of the currency should be burned into the minds of the people as a pertinent fact in every monetary discussion.

The first great contest between capital and labor in the United States had the banks, bondholders, and money dealers upon one side and the great masses of the people upon the other. It took the extreme nerve and determination of a Jackson to break the shackels of the banking power when our country had but a few people. We were then admonished by the incisive Benton that "the royal tiger has gone into the jungle and crouched on his belly, he awaits the favorable moment of emerging from his covert and springing on the body of the unsuspicious traveler." He did emerge in 1862, when the Government was floundering in the throes of a great internecine war. Hon. E. G. Spaulding, chairman of the subcommittee of Ways and Means, father of the greenback, and author of Spaulding's Financial History of the War, says at page 18 et seq:

After the legal-tender bill was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means by Mr. Spaulding, and published in the newspapers of the principal cities, opposition to it manifested itself in various ways. At first the New York press were generally opposed to the legal-tender clause. * * * Delegates from some of the banks in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia appeared in Washington to oppose the bill. * * * They organized by appointing Mr. Singleton A. Mercer, of Philadelphia, as chairman, and invited the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House to meet them at the office of the Secretary of the Treasury on Saturday afternoon, January 11, 1862. The invitation was accepted, and the convention assembled accordingly at the Treasury Department. * * * Mr. James Gallatin, of New York, made the principal speech against legal tender, and on behalf of himself and the bank committees from New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, and members from boards of trade associated with them, submitted the full plan for raising money to carry on the war, namely:

"First. A tax bill to raise, in the different modes of taxation, $125,000,000 over and above duties on imports.

"Second. Not to issue any demand Treasury notes, except those authorized at the extra session in July last.

"Third. Issue $100,000,000 Treasury notes at two years in sums of $5 and upward, to be receivable for public dues of the Government except duties on imports.

"Fourth. A suspension of the subtreasury act, so as to allow the banks to become depositories of the Government of all loans and to check on the banks from time to time as the Government may want money.

"Fifth. Issue 6 per cent twenty-year bonds to be negotiated by the Secretary of the Treasury and without any limitation as to the price he may obtain for them in the market.

"Sixth. That the Secretary of the Treasury be empowered to make temporary loans to the extent of any portion of the funded stock authorized by Congress, with power to hypothecate such stock, and if such loans are not paid at maturity to sell the stock hypothecated for the best price that can be obtained." * * *

The subcommittee of Ways and Means, through Mr. Spaulding, objected to any and every form of "shinning" by Government through Wall or State street, to begin with; objected to the knocking down of Government stocks to 75 or 60 cents on the dollar, the inevitable result of throwing a new and large loan on the market without limitation as to price; claimed for Treasury notes as much virtue of par value as the notes of banks which have suspended specie payments and which yet circulate in the trade of the North, and finished with firmly refusing to assent to any scheme which should permit a speculation by brokers, bankers, and others in the Government securities, and particularly any scheme which should double the public debt of the country and double the expense of the war by damaging the credit of the Government to the extent of sending it to "shin" through the shaving shops of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia.

The bankers and bondholders then made a most vigorous fight against any money being issued by the Government that could not be shaved by them or any other governmental policy which did not assure them interest-bearing bonds for a safe investment for their money. The House passed a bill making the greenback a full legal tender, which met the approval of the whole country, excepting this very small class. These banking committees and their allies induced the Senate to make them partial legal tenders, not receivable for import duties or the interest on the public debt. This gave the dealers in ready money the object sought; that is, gave them a forced market for their gold and enabled them to run gold to a premium. Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania, of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, said:

I have a melancholy foreboding that we are about to consummate a cunningly devised scheme which will carry great injury and great loss to all classes of people throughout this nation except one. With my colleague I believe that no act or legislation was ever heralded with as much joy throughout the length and breadth of this nation by every class of people, without exception, as the bill which we passed and sent to the Senate.

Congratulations from all classes—merchants, traders, manufacturers, mechanics, and laborers—poured in upon us from all quarters. * * * It is true there was a doleful sound came up from the caverns of bullion brokers and from the salons of associated banks. Their cashiers and agents were soon on the ground and persuaded the Senate with a little deliberation to mangle and destroy what had caused the House months to digest and consider and pass. * * * It makes two classes of money, one for the bankers and brokers and another for the people. It discriminates between the rights of different classes of creditors, allowing the capitalists to demand gold and compelling the ordinary lender of money on individual security to refuse notes which the Government had purposely discredited. * * * And that favored class is the bankers and brokers and nobody else.

The money dealers secured, in part, in 1862, their old demands that had been frustrated by Jackson. In 1870, when they prevailed upon Congress, in the name of patriotism and the public credit, to make their bonds payable in coin instead of legal-tender money, they made another valuable gradation. In 1873, when they demonetized silver, they intended to double the value of their securities, and their intentions were largely realized. When the people afterwards discovered that silver had been secretly destroyed they became determined to reinstate it. On the 5th day of November, 1877, in the House of Representatives, by a vote of 163 for to 34 against, a free-coinage bill passed. The sentiment then in the United States was overwhelmingly in favor of reinstating the standard silver dollar. The people everywhere denounced its demonetization as a crime and a theft. On the same day that the bill passed the House August Belmont wrote Senator SHERMAN, in the name of the public credit, to resist and stay the hand of the silver forces, and wound up his letter with this paragraph:

Sound financial policy and love of our country's fair name alike demand from those to whom the administration of its affairs have been intrusted the most uncompromising hostility to the blind and dishonest frenzy which has taken hold of Congress, and I sincerely hope that you will be seconded in the task before you by the support of the President and your colleagues.

On the 9th, two days afterwards, August Belmont & Co. wrote Senator SHERMAN that they would not call for bids on bonds, as such action would be held by those advocating legislation in favor of silver, as proving that such legislation was not prejudicial to the national credit and the refunding of our national debt. On the 10th, Mr. F. O. French, of New York, wrote Mr. SHERMAN as follows:

Our business people are very much alarmed at the rumored strength of the silver people, and as they apprehend the gravest disasters from the success of the Bland bill, a committee of gentlemen connected with insurance and trust companies, as well as with the banks, go to Washington to-morrow to present their views to the Finance Committee.

On the 29th of November Mr. Belmont again wrote Mr. SHERMAN, among other things—

The bonds are selling at ninety-nine to one-fourth in gold in open market, and it seems to me very doubtful policy to offer bonds by us to the public at this moment and thus assist the advocates of the old silver dollar by our apparent indifference to the injustice and dishonesty of the Bland bill.

In the second volume of Mr. SHERMAN'S Recollections, at page 603 et seq., he gives this correspondence in full, and it is the only correspondence exhibited upon this subject except Mr. SHERMAN'S replies confidentially assuring them that everything will come out all right.

Mr. SHERMAN also writes to Senator W. B. ALLISON, appealing to him to so amend the silver bill—that we can have all that is good out of it without the folly that might come from it if it resists our funding and resumption operations.

In answer to this, Mr. ALLISON, in the Senate, put on what is known as the Allison amendment, reducing silver to a commodity, in the Bland-Allison Act.

The point I wish to make here and to impress upon the public is the fact that in 1862 the money changers were trying to accomplish the same object that they are trying to accomplish to-day; that in 1877, with the country overwhelmingly in favor of the free coinage of silver, the bankers and brokers were the only men who were consulted by the Secretary of the Treasury, and their views were forced upon the country against its avowed will. Think for a moment of the familiarity and confidence that must have existed between Secretary Sherman and August Belmont & Co. to justify the latter in referring to Congress as being in the possession of a blind and dishonest frenzy.

Continuing this history, second volume of Sherman's Recollections, at page 1069, Mr. SHERMAN'S connections with the act of 1890 are given in his own language, namely:

The authorship of this law has been generally credited to me, and it was commonly called the Sherman silver law, though I took but little part in framing the legislation until the bill got into conference. The situation at that time was critical. A large majority of the Senate favored free silver, and it was feared that the small majority against it in the other House might yield and agree to it. The silence of the President on the matter gave rise to the apprehension that if a free-coinage bill should pass both Houses he would not feel at liberty to veto it. Some action had to be taken to prevent a return to free silver coinage, and the measure evolved was the best obtainable. I voted for it, but the day it became a law I was ready to repeal it if repeal could be had without substituting in its place absolute free coinage.

The act of 1890 was not an act of the silver people, but a law of the gold-standard people, the intention being to destroy silver by degrees and as rapidly as possible. The bankers and money changers had full possession of the friendly ear of the Treasurer in those days, have it to-day, and have had it for the past twenty years.

The Secretary and Comptroller of the Treasury have spent much of their time during this Administration in appearing before bankers' associations and organizations, have been extolled and toasted at their banquets, indicating that the Government only recognizes the views of money dealers in all governmental financial operations. These financial syndicates have had constant access to the President and the Secretary and Comptroller of the Treasury officially, socially, and in every other way. The Washington Star of January 3, 1896, in offering an apology for these manifest connections with the Government, said:

It is said at the White House that the presence in the city last night of Messrs. J. A. Stewart, J. F. Woodward, and E. R. Bacon, of New York, has no connection with the financial situation. They came in response to an invitation to attend the Cabinet dinner given by the President and Mrs. Cleveland last night, which invitation was extended, so it is said, long before there was any talk of any issue of bonds. Mr. Stewart and Mr. Woodward were members of the syndicate which floated the last Government loan, and consequently their presence here at this juncture was naturally regarded as significant.

These influences have been the real financial cabinet of the Government for a quarter of a century.

Unquestionably the original intention was to allow a private syndicate to enrich itself again at the Government expense. Public sentiment forced an apparent popular loan, which was but a popular banker's loan. There can be no such thing as a popular or public loan for gold. Gold is now the bankers' money. The people have no gold. As greenbacks or gold is deposited with the banks it is sorted out, laid away, and never paid out over the counter except as customers purchase it at a premium. I know of numerous individuals who desired to bid for some of these bonds but could not get the gold without going to the banks and paying a premium therefor. We have two kinds of money to-day, the bankers' money and the people's money. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and others insist that where we receive gold for bonds we are in duty bound to repay in gold, but these gentlemen are not willing to say that where we sell bonds for silver or other forms of money the bondholder should be repaid in the same kind of money that he furnished.

Section 3 of the syndicate contract of February, 1895, is:

The Secretary of the Treasury hereby reserves the right within ten days from the date hereof, in case he shall receive authority from Congress therefor, to substitute any bonds of the United States bearing 3 per cent interest, of which the principal and interest shall be specifically payable in United States gold coin of the present weight and fineness, for the bonds herein alluded to, such 3 per cent bonds to be accepted by the parties of the second part at par, i. e., at $18.6046½ per ounce of standard gold.

The President, in his message of February 8, 1895, stated to Congress:

The arrangement just completed, which after a careful inquiry appears, under present circumstances and considering all the objects desired, to be the best attainable, develops such a difference in the estimation of investors between bonds made payable in coin and those specifically made payable in gold in favor of the latter as is represented by three-fourths of a cent in annual interest.

In the agreement just concluded the only saving in interest to the Government if 3 per cent gold bonds should be substituted for 4 per cent coin bonds under the privilege preserved would be $539,159, amounting in thirty-six years, or at the maturity of the coin bonds, to $16,174,770 in addition to the millions he gave them on the undervaluation of the market price of the bonds.

Congress refused to grant the privilege to issue gold bonds. The President therefore sold these bonds on a silver basis with the direct understanding that they were payable in silver dollars at the option of the Government, and his private bond syndicate charged him, according to his own language, $16,174,770 therefor.

After paying his select syndicate this sum for the privilege of paying in silver, he and his Secretary persist in giving them gold interest and refuse to pay in silver, thus giving them this additional $16,174,770.

No one can thoroughly examine the official records without concluding, first, that silver was demonetized by and in the interests of the bond syndicates and money dealers of the world without the knowledge or consent of the American people. The history of the transaction since conclusively shows that the same power that destroyed silver in 1873 has controlled every President of the United States and every Secretary of the Treasury from that time until this and has managed and controlled the Senate or the House of Representatives at every session of Congress in its own selfish interest.

I know this history is old to many, but in my experience converts to this cause can only be made by inducing the people to read and examine the facts for themselves.

The present Banking and Currency Committee in the House and the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have been made up in favor of the single standard and bank rule. What is the significance of the condition in the Senate? These powers only operate upon one House at one time. To give some indication of the idea of the Banking Committee in the House, I here append an interview purporting to have been with the chairman of that committee, as follows:

BALTIMORE, January 30, 1896.

Hon. J. H. WALKER, chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, in an interview upon the financial situation, printed by the Manufacturers' Record, says:

"There never was a body of legislators more anxious to know what ought to be done under the circumstances and more anxious to do the right thing than the House of Representatives to-day. Congress will enact any measure that the bankers are agreed among themselves will relieve the United States Treasury. That is what we want, and Congress will enact no measure themselves, in the very breath they ask for it, say will not relieve the Treasury, and will only allow the banks to issue more money and still further embarrass the Treasury in redemption and only increase the bank dividends. Congress will gladly pass any measure to make banking more profitable if the bankers themselves will say it will at the same time relieve the United States Treasury situation. If this session Congress adjourns without passing some comprehensive measure to compose the finances of the country, the bankers will be wholly to blame for its failure in standing off and refusing to come to the assistance of the Committee on Banking and Currency while the committee is begging them to come to its relief with their councils and support. The committee will give most diligent heed to any suggestion they may make that has the slightest chance of passing the House, but it will not consider old schemes that have failed in every Congress for twenty years and if passed the bankers themselves say would not relieve the Treasury."

I am sorry that the people have not yet learned that this and all other great questions must be settled by the electors. No man in this House is open to a change of action should a change of conviction take place. It is the voter in the conntry that we must address and convince before this great question can be settled. When Coxey's army was marching on Washington the people and the railroads were blocking the way. A great divine interrupted and said, "All of our woes came from Washington, and it is meet that they should return to the place of their birth; let them go." But it was the voter that sent the woe makers to Washington. It is the electors that continually send them, and it is with the people first and Congress afterwards that this great question must be settled. It is a most rare thing that a member of this House knowingly contravenes the wishes of the vote-controlling influences of his party at home. The only new argument made this year over those of a quarter of a century ago is that we have now reached such a depth in the mire of the gold standard that we can not now safely extricate ourselves.

This has been the apology of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Secretary of the Interior, and will be the apology of all those changing from the advocacy of a double standard to that of the single gold standard. It must be borne in mind at all times that the money dealers of New England and of the Middle States and of nearly every large city in the United States now have complete control of the election influences and safely select and tabulate representatives of their own conviction at the election primaries. They have an overwhelming majority in this House that are ready to deny the truth of demonstration, yes, as it has been said, of the reliability of the laws of gravitation even, in support of the gold standard.

A few days ago I heard a Western Republican, a Populist, and a Southern Democrat in this House comparing notes. They agreed that they all believed the money question the overshadowing issue of the age. They agreed that their votes had always been cast in unison on this great question, and yet these three Representatives were divided and in three different political parties. It is safe to say that a decided majority of the American people believe that the money question is of overwhelming importance and must be settled in favor of the double standard, and that a sufficient amount of full legal-tender money must be issued as a foundation for prosperity, and without this that the people can not become prosperous. They are educated upon the necessity of the measure. Where they are greatly deficient is in a tactical education. The people at large have learned to despise what they call party machinery. They regard it as beneath them, and yet it is by and through a great machine that one-eighth of the people control the other seven-eighths directly against the interests and wishes of this great majority. The people must learn that they must unify, concentrate, and build up a good machine of the people and for the people for the purpose of destroying the great machines of the few that operate against the wishes of the many. The people are constantly wondering why it is that the few control the many. It is because the few are organized and concentrated on a fixed purpose and the many are disorganized and their influences divided. The great generals that have succeeded in the past in conquering superior numbers always attributed their success to a complete discipline and fortunate attacks on a disorganized and straggling enemy.

While our forces are so disorganized many votaries of the cause let the parade and cry of high tariff or low tariff, or some local measure, divert them from the cause for the time being. This is done at the ballot box. Immediately after the independent silver men met in Washington and determined to make this the overshadowing issue of future campaigns old party managers at once became alarmed, fearing the disintegration of the party machinery that put them in power. They at once began to connect a high tariff or a low tariff with the silver issue, some claiming that a high or a low tariff was more important in their States than financial reform. The New York Mercury of January 27, 1896, sums it up in this language:

Considerable anxiety and uneasiness exists in political circles at Washington concerning the ulterior purposes of the silver men in the ensuing Presidential canvass, as matured at their recent convention here. Hitherto the efforts of ultra silver men to accomplish anything definite politically in their several meetings and conventions at the National Capital have failed. All they could do was to secure the attendance of a small number of leaders, and, under the auspices of Senator STEWART of Nevada and General Warner, President of the American Bimetallic League, fulminate resolutions and protests and send them out through the country broadcast. The last convention, however, was quite an important meeting, numerously attended and particularly enthusiastic, in which Republicans, Democrats, and Populists fraternized on silver and apparently pooled their issues on that question, eliminating all others.

The trouble hitherto with silver leaders has been that they would not "fuse" with Populists because of their advocacy of various impractical propositions, such as were enunciated in the Ocala platform. The situation now has materially changed, since the peculiar contentions of the Populists have been laid aside temporarily, if not abandoned entirely, and their leaders, especially such men as Senator BUTLER, of North Carolina, and those of similar caliber, are now willing to join hands solely on the silver and other financial issues. It is this fact which seems to disturb the politicians, since, if this movement can be so manipulated, Republican supremacy in Colorado, Idaho, Utah, Montana, Washington, Oregon, the two Dakotas, Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, and possibly elsewhere may be jeopardized and the silver States of the South may follow suit. In this event a square-out silver party can be formed, and a Presidential ticket nominated upon an agreed platform. The result of such a combination, if effected, would necessarily impair, if not destroy, party lines, and, if not successful, might operate to throw the election of the President into the House for lack of a majority of the electoral college for either candidate.

In view of these facts belief is expressed that the particular strategy of the manipulators of the convention was to bring about this very condition of affairs, and they have high hopes of success.

It will be remembered that this is but a sample of the views of the gold press of the East.

Immediately after the silver meeting old party managers began to claim that other subjects, such as the tariff on lead or wool, were more important to their respective States in the West than the silver question, and started the cry for a union of the two interests, notwithstanding the fact that they have been claiming for a quarter of a century that the money question was the overshadowing issue of the age. This is another question that must be settled by the voters. While they permit those in office and those expecting to control patronage and expecting benefits therefrom to load down this overshadowing question with issues that will inevitably prevent a union of the forces of the South and West, the only feasible opportunity for a successful determination of this issue, just so long will a settlement of this question be delayed.

It seems to me that it is worse than folly, it is criminal, for the voters of the United States to further delay aligning themselves according to their convictions on this great question. The voters must have it seared into their minds that every man who advocates international bimetallism, high tariff or low tariff and bimetallism, or the union of the money question with any of the old threadbare political issues, advocates further delay, and if not an intentional enemy to monetary reform is, nevertheless, as potent for harm as he could be if his intentions were genuine.

As I was leaving my home in Colorado in November, a good silver man at heart and a late arrival from the State of Nebraska assured me that our Senators would be heartily seconded in the silver cause by Senator THURSTON, of the State of Nebraska. He said he had been a follower of him in the campaigns last year, and he was one of the most able advocates of silver in the United States. He did not make the distinction that he was only an international or an American-product bimetallist, which, in effect, means an indefinite continuance of the gold standard. At every opportunity the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] has voted against the silver cause. It must be seared into the minds of every advocate of monetary reform that those advocating international bimetallism, coinage of the American product, or anything other than the unqualified return to the bimetallism of the Constitution as it existed from the foundation of the Government down to 1873, is, in effect at least, a deadly enemy to the success of the silver cause.

It is not now a question of maintaining our financial liberties. They have been lost, and the potent question now is to recover them. As long as members of Congress owe allegiance to political caucuses; to some other issue, they will be diverted at every session of Congress; and this is a practical redemonstration of the fact that the people at home and at the ballot box must divide upon this great question. In fact, the time has come when some means must be adopted whereby all of the overshadowing national issues shall be submitted to a direct vote of the people and let them divide upon these questions, rather than into political parties. If not, our Government will be but Republican in form.

The desk of every member in Congress from the great labor districts of the country is swelled to overflowing with petitions for some device or plan by which the people may be permitted to vote upon all-controlling governmental questions of the age, uninfluenced by party politics, prejudices, or party expediencies. The silver-producing States have had numerous opportunities since 1873 to dictate the rehabilitation of silver. At one time a single vote for party instead of for the cause laid it aside. At other times two or three votes withheld from the great Eastern question of tariff could have secured it. But representatives from silver States, instead of subordinating all other issues to the success of this one, have voted for it and then obeyed the will of the Eastern manufacturers and voted for their chief industry without requiring a compensating vote for our absorbing interest.

This short-sighted and one-sided policy has continued until the East has secured the laws about as they desire. This is the first session of Congress that the Eastern Republican has felt independent. It is the first time in twenty years that he has felt safe in defying and ignoring his Western Republican brethren. Is it now too late to save this long neglected cause? Has the West trifled with this all-important question until the great South, which has been true to the cause, has lost all hope and will despair? I hope not. The task will be tenfold harder than it would have been in 1890, when the McKinley tariff was threatened. It will be tenfold more difficult than it would have been at any time prior thereto.

This House thoroughly understands the question. The people of the South and West understand the question, but with the great moneyed influence of Europe and the East thrown against it, they must subordinate every other issue to its success or the fight is now lost. It has been repeatedly demonstrated in this House that the prices of products all over the civilized world have kept a uniform pace with the price of silver.

It has been repeatedly demonstrated here and abroad that the divergence between gold and silver operates as a bounty of at least 100 per cent in favor of the silver-using countries.

It has been repeatedly demonstrated that with a fixed par of exchange between gold and silver America would control the wheat and cotton markets of the world. It has been repeatedly demonstrated that with the mint of one of the great commercial nations of the world thrown open to free coinage it would furnish such a demand for silver that it would pull down the price of gold and raise the price of silver, making a parity at the fixed legal ratio.

It has been repeatedly demonstrated here that it is not the relative quantity of the metals in existence, but the legal ratio and open mint of a great nation, that fixes the value.

It has been repeatedly shown on this floor and in the country that every gold-standard country has been gradually and constantly embarrassed ever since 1873, and that every silver-using country has been phenomenally prosperous and progressive from that date.

The history of the past thirty years is but a tale of hardship, increasing debt, increasing poverty, and declining hope in all gold-standard countries.

Work is required among the people. It is futile here. We need organizers, rather than educators. The people have always been educated upon this subject, but uneducated in feasible methods of making their will potential for results.

Subordination of party, subordination of all other interests, organization, and singleness of purpose will yet prevail and give us gold and silver and full legal-tender money and a Government by and for the people.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the privilege accorded to members, to print in the RECORD the following speech, delivered by Hon. J. W. BAILEY, at Sherman, Tex., on the 11th day of last June:

FREE COINAGE OF SILVER.

FELLOW-CITIZENS OF GRAYSON COUNTY: I have come, upon your invitation, to speak to you upon one of the most important questions that can engage your attention or the attention of your Representative in Congress. It appeals directly to the personal interest of every citizen, whatever may be his station or pursuit in life; it concerns alike the accumulations of the rich and the daily wages of the poor; it affects the relation of every debtor and creditor in the land; it largely determines the profits of our merchants and manufacturers; and upon it in a great measure depends the prosperity of our agricultural classes, the products of whose toil constitute three-fourths of our annual exports.

Certainly no thoughtful man can approach the discussion of a question so important and so far-reaching as this without a sense of grave responsibility. He must feel that if, consciously or unconsciously, he aids in the dissemination of false doctrines he does his countrymen an incalculable harm, while, on the other hand, if he can help them to a better understanding of it, he will render them a permanent and valuable service. Deeply impressed with this view, I have exercised the best faculties of my mind in a long and patient study of the subject, and though, of course, I do not hope that all of you will agree with me in my conclusions, I am certain that those of you who know me will concede that I have sincerely desired to ascertain the truth. Whether I have succeeded or not, is for you to judge; and without intending to flatter you in the least I beg to say that I consider you entirely competent to form a correct judgment. I am not one of those who believe that the money question is beyond the comprehension of the people. I belong neither to that class who seem to think that anybody can understand it without any study at all, nor to that other class who seem to think it so hopelessly abstruse that no ordinary man can understand it with any amount of study. The truth in this case, as in all others, lies between the two extremes. No man, however gifted he may be, can understand it without studying it, but any man of common sense who will study it can understand it.

Before entering upon the reasons which have induced me to favor the immediate restoration of silver to the position which it occupied in our financial system prior to the act of February 12, 1873, I desire briefly to remind you of the origin, the uses, and the qualities of money. To some of you it may seem unnecessary to occupy your time in restating such elementary ideas, but it is especially true of the science of money that unless we keep constantly before our minds a clear and definite conception of its first principles, we can never hope to comprehend it.

THE ORIGIN OF MONEY.

All of the great economists agree that money originates in the necessities of commerce and civilization, and that without it neither could advance beyond a very imperfect state. Without it exchange would require as much or more effort than production, thus entailing such a loss of time as would discourage that diversity of occupation which enables labor to acquire skill and to obtain its best reward. To make my meaning plain by illustration, let us suppose that a tailor should need a pair of shoes; it might take him longer to find a shoemaker who needed a coat than it would to make the coat after he had found him. He might find shoemakers who wanted hats, or bread, or meat, but he might not find one who desired a coat. The shoemaker himself, in his turn, might go hungry before he could find a baker who needed his shoes. To secure themselves against such mischances the tailor would be his own shoemaker and the shoemaker, his own baker. But under such a system neither commerce nor the mechanic arts could flourish, and agriculture would be subjected to even greater inconveniences.

Suppose a farmer desired to exchange one of his surplus cows for cloth. His first difficulty would be at home in finding a cow of the size to fetch exactly the amount of cloth he needed, and he would perhaps find it necessary to take one which was worth a little more or a little less. That difficulty would be a troublesome one, but it would not be the most troublesome one which the farmer would encounter. When he had selected the cow which would most nearly bring him the cloth he wanted, his next and greatest difficulty would be to find somebody who had the cloth he wanted and who wanted his cow. He would not be apt to find a butcher who kept cloth. Indeed, there would be no such business as that of a butcher in a community where all transactions were conducted by barter and exchange, because butchers could not maintain shops where the hardware merchant could only take meat of them when they were willing to take nails of the hardware merchant, or where the lumber dealer could only patronize them when they wanted lumber, and it would be a little awkward, to say the least of it, to exchange steaks for shingles every morning. What is true of the farmer's cow is true of his cotton and wheat, and the only way to overcome such difficulties was to find some one thing that would be accepted in exchange for all things. This one thing is called "money," and it has enabled society to subdivide its labors so that each man, by devoting himself to some one employment, can become an expert. Thus, and thus only, was it possible for mankind to achieve material progress.

THE USES OF MONEY.

The uses of money flow naturally from the origin of it, and therefore it is precisely as we might expect that its first or primary use is as a medium of exchange—as the one thing which will be accepted in return for all things. But after we have agreed to receive money for goods we still can not execute the agreement until we have also agreed upon the relative values; that is, how much money for how many goods.

The gradation from this point to the next is easy. Nothing can be more natural than that this one thing which is given and taken for all other things should become the one thing according to which the value of all other things should be estimated; and hence money becomes, in its second use, what is generally but loosely called a "standard of value." Eminent scholars have affirmed that society could better dispense with money as a medium of exchange than as a measure of value. They reason that, if there were no money, business could still be conducted by barter; but if there were no measure of value, each commodity would have to be compared with every other commodity, and as between any hundred articles there are 4,950 possible ratios of exchange, the price list would be an endless document. Under such a condition nobody would ever attempt to deal in anything except the commonest necessaries of life.

As commerce expands and industries multiply men enter into contracts for payments to be made at future times, and in such instances money serves a third use, as "a standard of deferred payments." Among a progressive and highly commercial people this third function of money is perhaps more important than either of the other two, and it grows more important with each succeeding year; because as a nation grows older and richer it increases the number and length of its time contracts.

QUALITIES OF MONEY.

The uses of money very clearly indicate the qualities which it ought to possess. Being intended as something which all men will accept for their property, it ought to be something which, like their property, has a value, an intrinsic value, if you please, And as it must perform so many different exchanges it ought to be easily susceptible of division into parts suitable for small transactions, and yet so valuable that its bulk will not encumber larger ones. Again, as the value of all other property is to be fixed by comparison with money, it ought to be as steady as possible in its value, because its variations can not fail to introduce uncertainty and confusion in all business. If the variations should happen to be rapid or violent merchandising would become a mere gamble, or else the storekeeper would be compelled to mark new prices on his goods with the beginning of each new week.

Important as stability in the value of money is in reference to our daily purchases and sales, it is incomparably more important when considered as "a standard of deferred payments." Here alterations not only confuse the trader, but they work an inevitable injustice—an injustice against which no caution and no wisdom can provide. If the value rises, the debtor suffers a hardship; and if it falls, the creditor suffers a loss. Of course I know, and every other thinking man knows, that absolute fixity in its value is unattainable so long as the great law of supply and demand continues in operation, and therefore in choosing a substance out of which to coin money we do not strive to find something invariable; because we know that it can not be found, but we choose that which varies the least, both in frequency and extent.

The earlier economists took corn as their measure of value, but it does not require very long nor very profound thinking to perceive their error. The annual production of corn is intended to meet the annual consumption, carrying only a small surplus from year to year, and consequently a short or an abundant crop must produce an immediate and great effect on its value. If a drought one year cuts the yield one-half, the price will double in six months, while if favorable seasons the next year produce more than a usual crop, another twelve months will witness another sharp movement in its price. No perishable commodity of which the annual production is intended to meet the annual consumption can be safely established as "a measure of value," or as "a standard of deferred payments." If a bushel of wheat were now our unit of value instead of the gold dollar, the man who promised on the 1st day of January to pay a thousand units on the 1st day of June would have found it necessary to part with twice as much property to have procured the thousand units when the debt matured as when it was contracted.

To guard against an injustice like this we must adopt as a unit of value something which is not consumed in its use, and which will go on accumulating through the ages until the annual supply will bear but a small proportion to the existing stock and will for this reason but slightly affect its value. The precious metals alone answer this requirement together with the requirements of intrinsic value and divisibility. Gold and silver, each and both, possess the qualities which fit them for use as money in such a degree as almost to persuade us that they were designed by an All-wise Creator for this special service of man. The question, then, presents itself, if both metals possess all of the attributes essential for their use as money, why shall we not use them both as such?

OBJECT OF DEMONETIZATION.

In the beginning of this controversy between the advocates and the opponents of a single standard there was no attempt to conceal the fact that the only object in demonetizing one of the metals was to increase the value of the other. The struggle began almost immediately after the gold discoveries in California and Australia, which were followed by a fall in the value of money and a rise in the price of property. During the ten years succeeding those discoveries, as compared with the ten years preceding them, the price of agricultural products and all other property rose 25 per cent. Few men in this day would be willing publicly to avow that this was a condition calling for the interposition of the law-makers. But it was different then.

The monometallists of that time openly proclaimed it to be an evil, and, without perplexing the public mind over ratios and parities, they boldly declared that inasmuch as the fall in the value of money had resulted from the enormous yield of the newly discovered mines, it ought to be counteracted by demonetizing one of the metals. But our friends on the other side disclaim all responsibility for the argument of their predecessors, and bitterly resenting the assertion that they favor increasing the value of money, they retort with the counter assertion that we are endeavoring to debase the currency. Either it is true, as we charge against them, that they advocate a policy which has constantly appreciated the value of our monetary unit, or else it is true, as they charge against us, that we advocate a policy which will depreciate it, because if our dollar is an honest one their dollar is too dear, while if their dollar is an honest one our dollar is too cheap. The core of this whole question is bound up in this statement, and I hope you will hear me attentively while I carefully consider it.

Perhaps we can obtain a clearer view of it if, instead of thinking about dollars, we will think of the bullion which composes the dollar. It has become such a settled mental habit to regard the dollar as fixed and unchangeable in its value that, although we all know that it is not fixed and that it does change, yet it is not always easy to avoid a confusion of thought when we undertake to point out its changes. Not only will it be conducive to clearness on our part to consider the bullion rather than the coin value, but our opponents can hardly object to this method of argument, because it is their principal insistence that the coin value and the bullion value ought to be identical. I do not disagree with them on this point; and, furthermore, it will not be amiss for me to say in this connection that I subscribe fully to the doctrine that the law can add nothing to the value of any article except by affecting the supply of it or the demand for it. But it is precisely this qualification, so indispensable to a correct statement of the economic principle, that our opponents always omit.

HOW LAW AFFECTS VALUE.

To exemplify the importance of this qualification let us imagine that to-morrow the law should forbid every person to eat bread made of wheat. The price of wheat would immediately fall, and why? Not because the law said that men should not eat wheat bread, but because, the law having said that, the demand for wheat would diminish and its price would fall in consequence of the diminished demand. To prove that this is not a distinction without a difference, if the day after the use of wheat as bread had been prohibited a new use for it could be found equal in value and extent to its bread use, its price would remain the same, although the law discriminating against it would still be on the statute books, because the diminution in the demand for it for one purpose would be neutralized by an increased demand for another purpose.

There is another and unanswerable proof of the soundness of this distinction in the fact that the price of corn would necessarily rise, though corn would not even be mentioned in the law against wheat; but there would be an increased demand for it to supply the want formerly supplied by wheat, and this increased demand would increase its price. It is as true of gold and silver as it is of wheat and corn that the law can affect their value by affecting the supply of them or the demand for them. The intelligent friends of silver do not expect that free coinage will add anything to the value of silver bullion or take anything from the value of gold bullion except in so far as it may affect the conditions of their supply and demand.

I am sometimes asked if the law can add 50 per cent to the value of silver why can it not add 100 per cent to the value of paper, as the Populists claim it can. I could answer that an increase in the demand for one article might be able to raise its price 50 per cent and still be utterly unable to raise the price of another article 100 per cent. But the true and better answer is, that it is not incumbent upon us to prove that free coinage will make the silver bullion in the present silver dollar equal in value to the gold bullion in the present gold dollar; provided we can prove that the silver in the silver dollar is worth as much to-day as it was in 1873, when the present unit of value was established, and that the gold in the gold dollar is worth double as much now as it was then. Can we prove this? Let us see.

WHICH IS THE HONEST DOLLAR?

In 1873 the 412½ grains of standard silver in the silver dollar were worth a fraction more than the 25.8 grains of standard gold in the gold dollar. In the next year the 25.8 grains of gold became a fraction more valuable than the 412½ grains of silver, and the divergence has grown wider with the years. This far we all agree. No man disputes their relative value in 1873, or their relative value in 1895.

Our disagreement begins when we attempt to account for the great difference which has occurred between these two dates. Our adversaries insist that this difference is attributable entirely to a fall in the value of silver, and we insist that it is due to a rise in the value of gold. This is purely an issue of fact, and a dispassionate investigation of it ought to bring reasonable and disinterested men to a somewhat similar conclusion. Comparing gold with silver and silver with gold will not aid us in our inquiry. Such a comparison will simply show that a great difference exists, but will still leave one side to ascribe it to a fall in the value of silver and the other side to a rise in the value of gold. This method of argument could be continued until the end of time without leading us any nearer to the truth.

MEXICAN DOLLAR ARGUMENT.

This is the vice of the Mexican dollar argument which some gentlemen seem to think so conclusive and over which they exhibit such a peculiar satisfaction. A very warm friend of mine a few days ago asked me how it was that twenty years ago a Mexican silver dollar would buy as much as our silver dollar, and that now our dollar will buy as much as two Mexican dollars. I told him that it was simply because the Mexican dollar passed at the bullion value, while our silver dollar passed at the value of a gold dollar, gold being our unit of value and the Government receiving the silver dollar the same as the gold dollar. He replied that he understood that, but what he wanted to know was, if the Mexican dollar, which passes at its bullion value, is only worth half as much as our dollar, did that not prove that the value of silver had fallen? I answered that the only thing which his comparison proved was that there is a difference between our dollar and the Mexican now that did not exist twenty years ago, but this difference might be due either to a fall in the value of the Mexican dollar or a rise in the value of ours; and to prove which it is it was necessary to introduce another element in the comparison. I said to him, "Suppose we state the proposition in this way: Twenty years ago a Mexican dollar would buy as much as our dollar; now our dollar will buy twice as much as a Mexican dollar, but the Mexican dollar will still buy as much as it would then, and our dollar will buy twice as much." I asked him if he did not think that the trouble was in our dollar rather than in the Mexican dollar. My answer satisfied him and I believe that it will satisfy all who weigh it.

THE TRUE TEST.

Instead of comparing gold and silver with each other we must compare both of them with other things if we expect to demonstrate a rise in the value of one or a fall in the value of the other. In this comparison we must take 1872 as the initial point, because, our purpose being to ascertain whether the ratio between gold and silver has been dislocated by the upward movement of gold or the downward movement of silver, we must base our comparison upon conditions which existed before this dislocation began. Beginning with 1872 we must first ascertain the relation which gold and silver bore to the various kinds of property at that time, I have here a book published by the Treasury Department which gives the price of our principal agricultural products. On page 408 it gives the New York price of cotton from 1848 to 1894, and the price for 1872 is given as 22.19 cents per pound. According to this table 25.8 grains of standard gold in 1872 would buy 4½ pounds of cotton, and 412½ grains of standard silver, being worth 3 cents more than 25.8 grains of standard gold, would have bought a fraction more than 4½ pounds of cotton.

Now, let us compare gold and silver with cotton since 1872. I will not take a single year to suit my purpose in the argument, but I will take the average price for the twenty-two years from 1872 to 1894, and I will show that during all these years 25.8 grains of gold would buy double as much as it would in 1872, while 412½ grains of uncoined silver would buy more than it would have bought then. During these twenty-two years the average price of cotton was slightly less than 11¼ cents per pound, and therefore 25.8 grains of gold would buy nearly 9 pounds of cotton. Since 1872 the average price of 412½ grains of silver, measured in gold, has been slightly over 80 cents, and therefore during this time 412½ grains of silver would buy nearly 7 pounds of cotton, showing that gold has doubled its purchasing power over cotton, and that silver has not lost, but has actually increased its purchasing power. What is true of cotton is also true of wheat. In 1872 the farm price of wheat was $1.24 per bushel, and 412½ grains of silver would buy a fraction more than eight-tenths of a bushel of wheat. The average price of wheat for the twenty-two years from 1872 to 1894 has been 85 cents per bushel, and the average price of 412½ grains of silver, measured in gold, has been slightly over 80 cents; therefore 412½ grains of silver would purchase during all this time over nine-tenths of a bushel of wheat, or 10 per cent more than it would in 1872.

If we go from the farm to the factory or the storehouse we shall find the same story repeated. I can take the silver dollar and, passing it at its bullion value, I can buy across any dry goods counter in Sherman to-night more calico, more linen, and more domestic than I could have bought twenty-two years ago. I can take 100 silver dollars and drop them into the melting pot and, after the stamp and superscription of the Government have been burned off them, I can take the metal to any hardware establishment in Texas and buy more nails, saws, hammers, axes, plows, and more of all other implements of labor than I could have bought in 1872. Not only this, but every man, woman, and child in this audience to-night knows that 25.8 grains of gold will buy twice as much from the dry goods merchant, twice as much from the druggist, and twice as much from the hardware dealer as it would twenty-two years ago.

With these undisputed and indisputable facts before us, it is no wonder that even the most extreme advocates of the single standard have been compelled to admit that, as compared with these great commodities, the value of silver has not fallen and the value of gold has risen. But to avoid the force of this admission, it is alleged that silver has actually fallen and that gold has not actually risen, and that the appearance to the contrary is due to the fact that there has been an improvement in the method of producing manufactured goods and an enormous increase in agricultural production. That the cheaper production of goods will culminate in a lower scale of prices no sensible man can doubt; nor will any candid man deny that an increase in the production of cotton and wheat will lower their price, unless there is a corresponding increase in the demand for them. I think it unquestionable that these agencies account for a per cent of the decline in prices, but that they account for all of it, or for the greater part of it, I believe to be susceptible of overwhelming disproof.

My judgment is that the fall in the price of goods resulting from improved methods of production has not been greater than the increase in the purchasing power of silver. I am confirmed in this belief because if new and cheaper processes of production had caused the present prices, these prices would have followed close upon the introduction of the new and cheaper processes of production, but such has not been the case. The decline has been gradual and constant, and must have been produced by some cause like the constant and gradual appreciation in the value of money. Moreover I know that there were great improvements in making goods from 1848 to 1873, and yet the scale of prices from 1848 to 1873 was a rising one, notwithstanding the improvements in production owing, as everyone admits, to the increased supply of money. From 1873 to 1895 the processes of manufacturing goods have been improved, but not at a greater rate than from 1848 to 1873, and yet the scale of prices from 1873 to 1895 has been a falling one, because the demand for money has increased more rapidly than its supply.

But even if I should be wrong in this supposition, and if improved methods of production have exerted a more powerful influence over prices than I think they have, it does not follow that I am wrong in my complaint against the increase in the purchasing power of the dollar. The position that the merchant has no right to complain about the lower price of his goods if they will procure him the same quantity of other commodities, is equivalent to saying that no improvement in the methods of production shall inure to his advantage. If you tell the farmer that he must be satisfied so long as his produce will buy as much cloth as formerly, and you tell the manufacturer that he must not complain so long as his cloth will buy as much produce as ever, you deny both of them the benefits accruing from the inventions of genius, and reserve their blessings for the money lender, half of whose dollars will buy as much of the farmer's produce and as much of the manufacturer's cloth, while it will take twice as much of the farmer's produce and twice as much of the manufacturer's cloth to buy the same number of the money lender's dollars. If the exchangeable value of all property falls together, no man will be able to procure more of what he wants with what he produces than before, and the producers will not be benefited. The only man who will find his purchasing power increased will be the man who owns dollars.

COTTON AND WHEAT.

In his Memphis speech Mr. Carlisle attempted to account for the fall in the price of wheat and cotton on the theory of their increased production. This is what he said:

The production of cotton in this country in 1872–73 was 2,974,351 bales, containing an average of 439 pounds net weight, while the production in 1893–94 was 7,549,817 bales, containing an average of 474 pounds net weight, or an increase of nearly 200 per cent in this country alone, besides the great increase that has taken place in competing countries; and in 1894–95 the production here was much larger, being nearly 10,000,000 bales. According to the statistics of the Agricultural Department the production of wheat in this country in 1872 was 249,997,100 bushels, and in 1894 460,267,416 bushels, or nearly twice as much, and there has also been an enormous increase of production in competing countries.

You will observe that he gives the cotton crop of the United States for 1872–73 as 2,974,351 bales. If he intended to give the crop of that year he understated it nearly a million bales, but as the figures he gives are exactly the crop for 1871–72, I assume that the date was an inadvertence. But giving him the benefit of this presumption, he is still amenable to the charge of unfairness in taking for his comparison the crop of 1871–72, which was 1,377,966 bales less than the crop of the preceding year and 956,157 bales less than the crop the following year.

Mr. Carlisle knows as well as any man how unsafe it is to generalize from particulars which are too narrow. He knows that the conditions of supply and demand with reference to a single article in any single year might be such as entirely to mislead us. It is only by taking a series of years or a number of articles that any general rule can be safely deduced. But, ignoring this plain principle, Mr. Carlisle takes the cotton crop of 1871–72 and comparing it with the cotton crop of 1893–94, declares that there has been an increase in the production of nearly 200 per cent; whereas if he had taken the crop of 1870–71 he would have found the increase to be less than 75 per cent, and if he had taken the crop of 1872–73 he would have found it to be less than 95 per cent.

This is not the only fair criticism of his speech on this score. He gives the increase in the production without intimating in the remotest way that there has been any increase in the consumption, and yet Mr. Carlisle must have known that the increase in our population exceeds the increase in the production of cotton in 1894 as compared with 1870–71, and nearly equals it as compared with 1872–73. Nor is this all. Every man who is familiar with the history of cotton culture and cotton manufacture knows that the increase in population does not fully measure the increase in the consumption of cotton, because it is now used in making many of the finer fabrics for which it was once supposed to be unfit.

PRICE AND PRODUCTION OF COTTON.

There is still another and a conclusive answer to Mr. Carlisle as to cotton. If, instead of taking a single year, as he did, we take a period of years, we can completely refute his argument. I have here a table giving our production of cotton for each year since 1838. In that year the crop was 1,363,000 bales, and it increased each year until the average annual production for the ten years from 1838 to 1848 was in round numbers 2,000,000 bales. The average crop for the ten years from 1849 to 1858 was 3,000,000, an increase of 50 per cent. But notwithstanding this increase of 50 per cent in production, the price rose from an average of 9¼ cents per pound for the first period to 12 cents per pound for the second.

Now let us compare the series of years immediately before and immediately after 1873—we can not take a period of ten years, for that would carry us back into the war, but taking five years each way we find that the average production for the five years from 1867–68 to 1871–72, inclusive, was 3,085,000, while the average production for the five years from 1873–74 to 1877–78 was 4,390,000 bales, an increase of 40 per cent. The average price for the five years from 1867–68 to 1872–73 was 28 cents per pound, and for the five years from 1873–74 to 1877–78 it was 14 cents per pound, a decrease of 50 per cent. And so it is that for the decade from 1848 to 1858 we find an increased production of 50 per cent, with an increase price of 25 per cent, while for the five years from 1873 to 1878, with an increased production of only 40 per cent, we find a decrease in price of 50 per cent.

How will our friends explain that during one period there was a rise of 25 per cent in price, notwithstanding an increase of 50 per cent in production, and in the other, with only 40 per cent increase in production, there was a fall of 50 per cent in price? There is but one explanation. It is simply because the first period coincides with the gold discoveries which began in 1848, and which, by increasing the supply of money, reduced its value, while the five years from 1873 coincides with the adoption of the single gold standard, which created an additional demand for gold greater than the additional supply, and this increased its value.

PRICE AND PRODUCTION OF WHEAT.

In the extract from the Memphis speech which I have read, Mr. Carlisle says:

The production of wheat in this country in 1872 was 249,997,100 bushels, and in 1894 it was 460,267,416 bushels, or nearly twice as much.

Here, again, Mr. Carlisle takes a single year and compares it with another single year, giving the increase in production without a single word about the increase in consumption. Fair-minded men who earnestly desire to know the truth might well distrust a teacher who states one element of value and suppresses the other, which is just as important. It appears from Mr. Carlisle's own figures, however, that the increase in our production of wheat in 1894, as compared with 1872, was 83 per cent, and this increase in the production of wheat was met and nearly counterbalanced by an increase of nearly 80 per cent in our population; and the growth of population has been much less than the increase in the consumption of wheat; for it is within my memory when many industrious families only used flour once a week, while now they use it daily.

If we accept Mr. Carlisle's explanation that the difference in production explains the difference in the price of wheat in 1872 and 1894, how will he explain that the wheat crop of 1890, which was only 399,262,000 bushels, was worth less per bushel than the crop of 1882, which was 504,188,470 bushels, or why the crop of 1893, which was 396,131,725 bushels, was worth 40 per cent less per bushel than the crop of 1891, which was 611,878,000 bushels. It will not suffice to answer that the production of other countries made this difference, because the world's crop in 1882 was larger than it was in 1890, and the world's crop in 1891 was larger than it was in 1893.

A comparison of these four years might be misleading, and so let us subject the world's crop for a period of years to this test of overproduction. Beginning with 1882, when the crop was 2,258,982,485 bushels, and taking the ten years up to and including the unprecedented crop of 1891, we find that only three out of the ten crops exceeded the crop of 1882, and the average was in round numbers 2,180,000,000 bushels, or nearly 80,000,000 bushels less than the crop of 1882. But in the face of this lower average production, and in spite of the fact that the world was increasing its population and its consumption of wheat, the price steadily declined. No reasonable man can believe that the difference in production has made the difference in price, for there is practically no difference in production. The conflict between the Secretary's theory and the cold matter of fact is irreconcilable, and his theory must be rejected. There being no difference in the conditions of supply and demand, nothing can explain the difference in price except the increase in the value of money.

THE PRECIOUS METALS.

I now desire to invite your consideration to some facts which must have affected the value of money. It must be remembered that gold and silver are articles of commerce, and are bought and sold like everything else; and that, like everything else, their value is determined by their supply and demand. This being true, it could not be otherwise than that the value of gold has enormously increased since 1873, because the demand for it since that time has increased out of all proportion to the increase in its supply. Since then Germany, Holland, and Austria-Hungary, which had been silver-standard countries, have adopted the exclusive use of gold, and the United States, France, Italy, Belgium, and several smaller nations, whose mints had stood open to gold and silver alike, have passed to a single gold standard.

In order that you may form some idea how this increased demand has been proportioned to the increased supply, and how it must therefore have affected its value, I will call your attention to three tables which appear in this book published by the Treasury Department. On page 95 you will find a table giving the world's production of gold and silver from 1792 to 1892. If you will make the addition you will find that the world's production of gold from 1879, the year we resumed specie payments, up to and including 1892, when the table concludes, was $1,535,000,000. On page 106 is another table exhibiting the amount of gold and silver in the United States on the 1st day of each July, from July, 1870, to 1893.

By reference to this table you will see that in 1878 we had only $25,000,000 of gold, and even this amount included the subsidiary silver coin then in circulation. Beginning the fiscal year 1879 with only $25,000,000 in gold, we increased our stock to $664,000,000 in 1892. On page 149 of this same publication is a table which shows that the United States consumed $192,000,000 of gold in the arts and manufactures from 1880 to 1892. Subtracting the $25,000,000 with which we began the fiscal year of 1879 from the $664,000,000 with which we closed the fiscal year of 1892, we have $639,000,000 absorbed in our monetary uses; and adding to this the sum of $192,000,000 consumed in manufactures and in the arts, we have $831,000,000 as the total increased demand of the United States for gold from 1879 to 1892, while the increased supply of the whole world was only $1,535,000,000.

With this increased demand on the part of this one country, equal to more than 55 per cent of the increased supply of all the world, and with an increasing demand on the part of other nations to meet the needs of their expanding commerce and population, I submit to your common sense, my countrymen, if there is any escape from the conclusion that the value of gold has been vastly augmented. If there is still a doubt in your minds, that doubt must be dispelled when I show you from this same Treasury publication that while the gold production of the world from 1873 to 1892 has been $2,210,961,206 the gold coinage for the same time has been $2,787,714,679, an excess in the coinage over the production of $576,943,469. Some part of this excess represents recoinage; but after making proper allowance for that, the world has been compelled to lay its plate and jewelry under contribution to meet its increasing demand for money.

SILVER SUPPLY AND DEMAND.

The defenders of a gold standard point to the greatly increased production of silver as an evidence that its value must have declined. I would be the last man here or elsewhere to deny that an increase in its production, unless accompanied by an increase in the demand for it, would produce a fall in its value. If, however, the increase in the demand has kept pace with the increase in its supply, its value must have remained stable, for it is not supply alone nor demand alone, but supply and demand together, which regulates value.

With this criterion in our minds we can pursue our investigation with a reasonable hope of arriving at the truth. Our starting point, of course, must be 1873, because whatever may be the change in the value of silver growing out of its production, it must be explained by the difference between its production then and its production now. From 1873 to 1892 the entire silver production of the world was $2,400,000,000, and during that time silver constituted the only money of over 800,000,000 people, to say nothing of the amount required by gold-standand countries for subsidiary coinage. If every dollar of silver produced in the world had been employed by countries which use it exclusively as their money it would have provided an increase of less than $3 per capita in the twenty years. Fortunately we are are not left to guess about the demand for silver as related to its supply.

The mint reports of the various countries show that the world's silver coinage from 1873 to 1892 was $2,322,000,000, leaving only $78,000,000 for use in manufacture and in the arts. That this amount was grossly inadequate will appear from the report of the Director of our Mint, which shows that from 1880 to 1892 this country alone consumed in manufactures and in the arts $91,000,000 worth of silver, or $23,000,000 more than the entire world's surplus. And, moreover, though we have been a gold-standard country since 1873, from 1879 to 1892 we have absorbed over $700,000,000 worth of silver, while the entire world's production was only about $1,800,000,000, showing an increased demand on the part of this one gold-standard country equal to over 40 per cent of all the silver produced in the world. It is certain that the consumption of silver since 1873 has exceeded its production, and that to supply the coinage demand, together with the demand for manufactures and the arts, we have encroached upon the accumulations of former years.

There have been so many and such inexcusable misrepresentations as to the output of the silver mines in the last twenty years that many intelligent men believe that the production of silver has been three or four times as much as the production of gold, and that it will admit of indefinite extension, and yet the Treasury statistics show that, while the production of silver since 1873 has been $2,400,760,533, the production of gold for the same time has been $2,210,961,206, or a difference of less than $191,000,000 in twenty years. A successful business man said to me a few days ago that the increased production of the silver mines in the United States alone since 1873 was enough to overstock the world, and he was astounded when I presented him with a Treasury report showing that our increase in silver production has been but slightly greater than our increase in population. The world's highest production of silver in any one year from 1792 to 1892 was $196,000,000, which was less than 2½ per cent of the stock on hand. It is incredible that an increase of 2½ per cent in any one year could seriously impair the value of a great mass of any article. An increase of 2½ per cent in the annual production of corn or cotton or any perishable commodity would not seriously affect its price.

But, fellow-citizens, I must not detain you longer on this branch of the question. Nine-tenths of the men on the other side are estopped from denying that monometallism has depreciated the price of property and appreciated the value of money, because they profess themselves intensely desirous of restoring bimetallism through an international agreement; and they can not be so anxious to restore the double standard unless the single standard is an evil. But when driven to acknowledge the insufficiency and injustice of monometallism they resist the restoration of bimetallism upon reasons which it will be interesting for us to examine. The three principal objections which they offer are:

First, that silver is cheap money; second, that the free coinage of silver will derange our foreign commerce because our dollar will not be worth 100 cents in all the markets of the world, and third, that free coinage does not mean bimetallism, but simply means a substitution of silver monometallism for gold monometallism. I have already disposed of the first objection in considering another aspect of the question, and I trust that I have made it plain that instead of the objection being against the cheapness of silver it is properly against the dearness of gold.

INTERNATIONAL COMMERCE.

The objection that free coinage will derange our foreign commerce because our dollar will not be worth 100 cents in the markets of the world is based upon a misconception of the nature of international trade and of the function which the precious metals perform in such trade. Two years ago when I declared in a public speech that money is not used in the settlement of international balances, but that they are settled with bullion, and that even if coin is used at all, it is used as bullion and at its bullion value, I was viciously assailed. I did not reply. Knowing perfectly well that I was right, I was content to abide my vindication, but I hardly expected my critics to be rebuked by having my statement repeated by the Secretary of the Treasury in so short a time; and yet this is exactly what has come to pass. In his Memphis speech, Mr. Carlisle lays down the doctrine in these words:

> There is no legal tender in international trade. Whether payments are made in gold or silver coins, or in gold or silver bullion, actual intrinsic value determines the amount or quantity to be delivered, no matter what may be the legal-tender laws of the different countries, and no matter though they may have the same or different ratios of value between the metals within their respective limits.

It is true that he made this statement for the purpose of enforcing his opinion that the coin value and the bullion value of the metals ought to be the same—a proposition from which I do not dissent; but whatever may have been his purpose in stating the fact, that does not alter or qualify the fact itself, and hereafter when gentlemen talk about wanting a dollar worth 100 cents in all the markets of the world they must be reminded that Mr. Carlisle himself has said there is no such thing as a dollar in the markets of the world, and that when you take a dollar into those markets it ceases to be a dollar and becomes a mere commodity, to be sold according to its weight and fineness. With this fact admitted, the catch phrase of a dollar worth 100 cents in all the markets of the world becomes utterly meaningless and can not be imposed upon intelligent men much longer. It is difficult to see how any sensible man can deceive himself or be deceived about this matter. The least reflection upon it must convince him that nothing but our domestic trade can be affected by the legal value of a dollar, because in our trade with other countries we do not use dollars.

We give and receive goods in exchange for goods, and the balance of trade, whatever it may be and whoever must pay it, is, as Mr. Carlisle himself affirms, paid in the metals at their bullion value. So far from hindering our commerce with foreign nations, nothing could be better calculated to promote it than a return to the coinage system under which we could trade with all nations without those disturbances in the par of exchange which embarrass trade between countries using different metals. If we could resume the use of both metals, we could say to gold-using countries that we would trade with them, buying what we wanted of them and selling what they wanted of us, the balance to be paid or received in gold. We could also say to the silver-using nations that we would buy their goods and sell them ours, receiving or making payment of the balance in silver. Under a system like that, this Republic could carry her commerce into all the regions of the earth and drive the merchantmen of Great Britain from the high seas of the world.

SILVER MONOMETALLISM.

The third objection, that free coinage will simply substitute silver monometallism for gold monometallism, is as untenable as the first and second objections. In the first place, to give it even the semblance of correctness they are compelled to reject the long-established definition of bimetallism and to set up a new one which has no sanction in reason or authority. Bimetallism, as every student of the question knows, means no more than that the mints of the country shall be open to the free and unlimited coinage of both metals into standard money of legal-tender quality; and it does not require the concurrent circulation of both metals. The scientific truth which underlies and supports the theory of bimetallism is that by allowing the people a choice between the two metals, whenever one unduly increases its value they will abate their demand for it, which will tend to counteract the increase in its value, and will increase their demand for the other, which will tend to increase its value, thus preserving their equilibrium.

The fear that if we resume the free coinage of silver our gold will all immediately leave the country is groundless. This same prediction was made with equal confidence before the Bland law was passed in 1878. It was freely asserted that if we entered upon even the limited coinage of silver it would only be a few months until our only metallic money would be a debased and mutilated silver coin. I remember well that a great man, whose fame is a part of the history of my native State, was so certain of this result that he refused to obey the instruction of the Mississippi legislature, and in a speech replete with evil prophecies, not one of which was ever fulfilled, he worked out the problem just as his successors do to-day. After estimating the gold in the country at between $150,000,000 and $200,000,000, he argued then, as Secretary Carlisle argues now, that the coinage of silver was tedious and slow; that it would require many years to coin as much silver as the gold we had; and that as the beginning of silver coinage would immediately expel all of the gold, there would be a great contraction of the currency.

Despite these predictions of disaster, the Bland bill became a law, being passed by Democratic votes over the veto of a Republican President, and instead of losing our gold the stock of it continued to accumulate until within ten years after its enactment we had over $700,000,000. These gentlemen seem to think that if we did not use silver we would have no trouble in keeping all the gold which we produce. They forget that during the eleven years from 1848 to 1859 we produced $595,000,000 worth of gold, and yet in 1859 we had only $250,000,000 in the country, which shows that during a time when the silver question was not an issue we were able to keep only 45 per cent of our gold. The only effect which the legal ratio has on the exportation of the metals, where both are used and one is undervalued, is that whenever it is necessary to send either abroad to settle balances or make purchases the undervalued one, being worth more relatively as bullion than as coin, will be sent, because in foreign markets it is treated as bullion and not as coin.

But aside from making purchases and paying balances neither metal will ever be exported unless it becomes more valuable in other countries than in this; and whenever an ounce of gold is worth more elsewhere than it is here and the difference in its value above the cost of transportation will net a fair profit to the exporter it will be exported, whether we use one metal or both. Nothing obeys the law of attraction so certainly and so quickly as the precious metals. They always go, and go speedily, to the markets where they sell for the highest price; and it is the special virtue of bimetallism that when one of them is in such demand as to greatly enhance its value it can be relinquished and the other used. The delusion that gold must be kept at any price is a relic of what is known in the history of political economy as the "mercantile theory," which dominated the business and economic thought of Europe until exploded by Adam Smith more than a century ago.

THE RATIO.

The gold expulsion argument proceeds upon the assumption that the ratio of 16 to 1 is not correct and that, though it is incorrect, the friends of silver will not correct it. This is purely gratuitous and unwarranted. The intelligent advocates of bimetallism insist as sincerely and as strenuously as anybody that all dollars in this country shall be of equal value, and we have over and again pledged ourselves that if we can restore silver to its equal privilege with gold both at the mint and before the law we will make the silver bullion in the silver dollar worth the gold bullion in the gold dollar. What we protest against is the folly and injustice of judging the relative value of the two metals while one of them is money and the other a commodity. We know that it is impossible to institute a true comparison under such circumstances. If you desired to compare the height of two men you would not stand one on the roof of this opera house and the other on the sidewalk, but you would take the man on the sidewalk up to the roof of the opera house or you would bring the man on the roof of the opera house down to the sidewalk before you would undertake to tell exactly what was the difference in their height.

If you were intelligent, after you had stood them side by side, the first thing you would do would be to look at their feet and see if they were on a level, because you would perfectly understand that the difference in their heads might be produced by the difference of the levels on which they stood. But when you had put the feet of both on the same level, you would know that the difference in their heads measured the difference in their height. That is precisely our position on this question. Before we compare these two metals we desire to put them on the same plane, and this can only be done by resuming the free coinage of silver. Of course we can not resume without a ratio, and as we must begin somewhere, I prefer to begin where we left off. After we have done this, and have ascertained what the difference is, it then becomes our duty to consider the cause of that difference. If it has been caused by a fall in the value of silver, we must put more silver in the silver dollar in order to preserve the stability of the unit; if it has been caused by a rise in the value of gold, we must take some gold out of the gold dollar in order to preserve the stability of the unit.

This suggestion is neither novel nor dangerous. We have a precedent for it, and a precedent, too, established by the second founder of Democracy. During President Jackson's Administration the parity of our gold and silver coins was displaced, but the statesmen of that generation did not propose to demonetize either metal on that account. They simply recognized the necessity of readjusting the ratio, and carefully weighed the matter to see whether the displacement had been caused by the depreciation of silver or the appreciation of gold. Their conclusion was that the trouble lay in the appreciation of gold, and they corrected it by taking some of the gold out of the gold dollar, thus equalizing the value of the two coins and preserving the stability of the monetary unit. Why can not we do the same thing? There is nothing sacred either about the ratio between the two metals or about the quantity of metal in either coin. The sacred thing, against which no Congress ought to legislate, is the value of the coin.

THE DOLLAR AND THE YARDSTICK.

I often hear men say that the dollar ought to be as fixed and unchangeable as the yardstick, and though I thoroughly agree with what they say, I doubt if I agree with what they mean. The analogy between the yardstick as a measure of length and the dollar as a measure of value is imperfect, for the reason that the yardstick is simply and only a measure of length, while the dollar is not only a measure of value, but is also a medium of exchange and a solvent of debts, and it is for these latter uses that it is sought. Nobody ever buys or sells a dollar to be used as a measure of value. In fact, though the law now decrees the gold dollar to be the unit of value, the coinage of it is expressly forbidden, and all which have been coined have been called in to be recoined into pieces of other denominations.

If dollars were not needed to pay debts and perform exchanges there would be no demand for them and their value would be inconsiderable. But they are needed for these purposes, and in this fact lies the impossibility of making the value of the dollar as invariable as the length of the yardstick. You will instantly perceive the difference. The demand for yardsticks can have no possible effect upon their length. If there was but one in America to-night and every merchant in the land was bidding for it, the price might be $1,000, but its measure would still be the same; or if there were 100,000,000,000 yardsticks in the country, with every merchant supplied and no man wanting to buy one, the price of the yardstick might be less than a hundredth of 1 cent, but every yardstick of the 100,000,000,000 would measure exactly 36 inches.

The dollar is altogether different in this respect. If there was only one dollar in this country it would be difficult to compute its value, and it is certain that if there were one hundred billion here every one of them would be worth less than 5 per cent of what they are to-day. Nothing can be surer than that the length of the yardstick is not in the least affected by the number of them in existence, and it is equally certain that the value of each dollar is largely governed by the number of them in circulation.

If the yardstick were made of a material that would extend and contract its length as the demand for it increased or decreased, then we would have a yardstick analogous to the dollar. Suppose we had such a one and suppose the demand for it had been steadily increasing for twenty years, and that with the increasing demand of each year it had been growing longer until it was now 72 inches long instead of 36. Would any man venture to say that it would be an honest measure of length? And yet it would be just as honest as a dollar which has doubled its value. Perhaps the apologists of the lengthened yardstick would contend, as do the apologists of the more valuable dollar, that the yardstick had not grown longer, but that everything else had grown shorter, and, though we could show that it had formerly been the length of an ordinary man's arm, and that it was now twice that long, they would insist that the yardstick was all right, but that in consequence of the overproduction of men their arms had grown shorter.

THE BEST MONEY.

Our opponents tell us that they favor the gold standard because gold is the best money in the world. If they mean by this that gold is the dearest money in the world, I will grant it; and I will also grant that if the dearest money is the best, then gold is not only the best money now but it is getting better all the time, because it is constantly growing dearer. But, my countrymen, we do not think that the dearest money is necessarily the best money. We believe that the best money is the money which is the most unchangeable in its value. We do not differ with the advocates of the gold standard in our desire for the best money, but we differ with them as to what constitutes the best money. They consider that the best which possesses the highest value, while we consider that the best which possesses the greatest stability of value.

I am as much in favor of an honest dollar as any living man, but I am as much opposed to one which is too dear as I am to one which is too cheap. I want a stable dollar, and a stable dollar neither goes up nor down. I am so much in favor of stability in the value of the dollar that I would not hesitate to change the metal in it in order to preserve its value. If a man who knows nothing about the money question will listen to the superficial declaration about the dishonesty of changing the bullion in the coin he will conclude that the important quality of our dollar is not its value, but the quantity of metal in it. The absurdity of this contention is palpable. We all affirm that the most desirable quality in a dollar is invariability.

What do we mean by invariability? Do we mean invariability in the amount of the metal which it contains, or do we mean invariability in value? The question answers itself. The unit being one of value and not of quantity, the invariability which it ought to possess is the invariability of value, and the metal in it ought to be changed whenever a change is necessary to preserve its value. Under the operation of a single gold standard our money has lacked the essential quality for twenty years, and the lack will probably be intensified in the years to come. Indeed, it must be, because after the demand for gold to be used in the manufactures and the arts has been supplied the annual addition to the money of all the world is less than $80,000,000, and this sum is scarcely sufficient to repair the waste of existing stock. With a volume of trade enlarging faster than the volume of money, the value of the dollar must continue to increase.

DEBTS ABSORB PROPERTY.

But what is the harm, I have heard it asked, if the dollar does increase the value? If it takes twice as much property to buy it, will it not buy twice as much when you get it? This statement of the question is not broad enough. It presupposes only the buyers and sellers of property and does not embrace the buyers and sellers of money. A large majority of our people use borrowed capital, and from time to time are compelled to buy money with which to discharge their obligations, and it is upon them that the misery and injustice are inflicted.

To-day we own $70,000,000,000 worth of property and we owe $35,000,000,000, the dollars which we owe being equal to one-half of the property which we own. If the value of these dollars increases during the next twenty years as it has during the past twenty years, in 1915 the value of the dollars which we now owe will equal three-fourths of the property which we now own; and if in another twenty years a similar increase in the value of the dollar occurs, in 1935 the value of the dollars which we now owe will be equal to all of the property which we now own. Thus the owners of our present indebtedness can sit idly down, and, living upon their current interest, they will see the silent and pitiless accretion in the value of their dollars absorb the property on which they hold their mortgages.

No business can survive this ceaseless grind. In the end, the active users of capital will be crushed and all enterprise will be discouraged; the profits of merchandising will be absorbed by the growing burden of debt and merchants will be forced into bankruptcy; the progressive men who have borrowed money and built cities will find their property eaten up by an unearned increment and their families impoverished; mills will pass out of the hands of their owners into the hands of their mortgagees, and we shall have a state of society in which no workingman prospers and no prosperous man works. It is this unspeakable calamity which I entreat my countrymen to avert.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, before I begin my very brief remarks I should like the Clerk to read two extracts from the newspaper which I send to the desk, the leading Democratic newspaper in the State of North Carolina, the Charlotte Daily Observer.

The Clerk read the following from the address of the national executive committee of the People's Party:

The line of battle has already been drawn. In the coming fight every voter must be on one side or the other. He must line himself up with the gold combine, with trusts, monopolies and British tories, or he must line himself up with the people in support of the candidate who will be nominated at St. Louis on July 22.

The Democratic wing of the gold party and the Republican wing of the gold party will nominate candidates who belong to the British gold trust and who stand for the same evils that now curse humanity.

The Clerk also read the following from the Washington correspondence of the Charlotte Daily Observer:

I quote the written words of an intelligent and responsible man who has talked with some of the silver Republicans in Congress within two days:

"The silver Republicans realize that they have no chance of getting what they want from the Republican national convention. They are now fully determined not to support a gold candidate for the Presidency nor to accept any but a plain silver platform. This means that when the time comes they will have to break with their party on the national ticket and vote for a silver candidate if any is in the field, other than a Populist. If the Democrats will come out for silver the support of these Senators will be given to the Democratic ticket."

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret to observe that many gentlemen to whom I desired especially to address myself to-night are not here. Some of them, I dare say, are in their rooms; some at the theater; some at the Princeton alumni dinner, and a great many of them are in North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I have only two things to say, one that will perhaps occupy three minutes and the other about seven minutes; and but for the declarations which the Clerk has read I should not have undertaken to tax the attention of the House to-night.

When this bond bill was introduced and forced through the House with so much haste that the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] did not give us any chance to be heard, and did not give us a chance even to "kick," I stated the reasons for my opposition to that measure in the RECORD. I undertook there to say that the measure would not pass the other branch of this Congress, and that certainly it would not pass the White House. And I am here now to say that the measure which has been declared here as the voluntary policy of the Republican party is one of which I challenge the wisdom, of which I challenge the Republicanism, of which I challenge the necessity. And without being a soothsayer, I shall venture to say that when the grand quadrennial assize of the Republican party meets on the west bank of the Mississippi River, as it will in June next, this voluntary declaration will not be incorporated as a plank in that Republican platform. I deny that the Republican party is willing to go upon record declaring that it favors a policy of borrowing money rather than of earning money. [Applause.]

In this connection I wish to say that whatever that grand tribunal may do and whomever it may nominate—whether it be that leader of leaders from the State of Maine, Hon. THOMAS B. REED, or whether it be that spotless statesman who sits in the other wing of this Capitol and whose whole life has been a synonym of purity and of faithful service to his country, Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, or whether it be that magnetic son of the State of Ohio whose name is synonymous with the bed-rock principle of the Republican party, the principle of protection—whoever may be the nominee of that convention, he is going to get my vote. [Applause.]

In the deliverance which the Clerk has read I am classed as a silver Republican. He did not read the whole of that deliverance, but only as much as I could allow time for in the limited period accorded me. There have been two deliverances recently upon the subject of what is called the new silver party. One is in that paper, addressed to the voters of my State; and it is an invitation to all of us Republicans, Populists, and Democrats to break up the old party lines and go into the silver party. I am glad to recognize that a distinguished representative of that party, and the only one named as such in the Congressional Directory [Mr. NEWLANDS], sits before me. With great respect to him and to the purpose that he has in view, I say now that I take the earliest opportunity to decline the invitation which the leader of the Populist party has framed in the letter which has been read. I decline it not only in my own name, but in the name of 125,000 true Republicans in the State of North Carolina to-day. We are not going to break the ranks; and we are not going into a new party which has one single idea, and which will not receive 50 electoral votes in the next Presidential contest, as we know and as they know. [Applause.]

But I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the eloquent and the very closely knitted speech that we listened to this afternoon from the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DINGLEY] has not done so much damage to the cause of silver as a certain other pronunciamento which has shattered all the traditions of a century, and which has astounded the old fathers, whom we recognize and honor here in this Congress—a pronunciamento which was uttered under such circumstances, with such intemperance of language, with such ferocity of threats, that it reminded me of the dreadful images in Calphurnia's dream, where she sees in fancy—

Fierce, fiery warriors, fighting upon the clouds,
Which drizzled blood upon the capitol.

We heard there of agrarian joining with communist; we heard of tramps moving on the Capitol; we heard of dynamite; we heard of anarchy; we heard of shotguns; and we heard of pitchforks. I desire to say to my silver friends that I as much as any of them desire the restoration of silver to its dignity and functions as a money metal, but that their cause is not going to be advanced by any such language as that. Their cause is not going to be advanced by hoisting the red flag of anarchy or the black flag of dynamiters in this country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I know that the Republican party will solve this question in such a way as to give the very largest possible coinage of silver that is consistent with the credit of this Government. The Republican party stands for the credit of this nation; it stands for the honor of the country; it stands for the glory of the American flag; it stands for freedom to all men.

And now, one word more in reference to that pronunciamento, that invitation to carry us over into a new secession movement, you may call it. We have tried that in the past. We tried it at the instance of South Carolina some thirty-six years ago. She invited my State to join her in the secession movement and we declined, and continued to decline, until we were driven or rather dragged into that horrible conflict and South Carolina got thoroughly whipped.

Mr. TALBERT. I deny it; and she is not ashamed of the act. She would do it again under like circumstances.

Mr. PEARSON. I am ashamed of the fact and ashamed of any man who would indorse secession or the motives which lead to it. [Applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. I do. I indorse it, and every word of it.

Mr. PEARSON. I have heard it said that if hell ever breaks loose in this country it will be in South Carolina, and I believe that is true, from the exhibition made here to-night. [Laughter and applause.]

This autocrat, who has built up his power partly on class prejudice and partly by the nullification of the Constitution of the United States, may mark your State with ruin, but fortunately his control stops at the line of South Carolina. [Applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. The Republican party has ruined the whole nation.

Mr. PEARSON. We might not have regretted so much the whipping received by South Carolina, but unfortunately we got whipped ourselves.

Mr. TALBERT. South Carolina never was whipped and never will be. She got tired of whipping the other fellows. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEARSON. It is proposed now to draw a new line—not a Mason and Dixon's line, but a kind of northwest and southeast line. I do not know where the termini may happen to be placed, but I thank God the Mason and Dixon line has been obliterated from the map and is only a memory in the minds of such men as my honorable interlocutor. [Applause.] Thank God, we have no more sections, and I believe the Republican party, standing as it does for the honor of the country, the glory of the flag, the doctrine of protection to every section of the Union, is the party to which every honest silver man should belong; because, while other parties may have something to say about it, the Republican party is the only party that will have anything to do about it. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. TALBERT. We have very few such men in South Carolina and do not want them.

Mr. PEARSON. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I append extracts from various State Republican conventions in condemnation of bond issues, which I commend to the careful consideration of the House.

REPUBLICAN STATE CONVENTIONS CONDEMN BOND ISSUES.

[Massachusetts Republican, October 5, 1895.]

The last Congress provided a revenue shamefully inadequate, and by the issue of bonds shifted on to succeeding Administrations the burden of their outlay.

[New York Republican, September 17, 1895.]

We denounce the Democratic Administration for its gross mismanagement of the finances of the nation. It already has added more than $165,000,000 to the national debt and the burdens of the people, and there is every evidence that this increase is to be continued.

[Kentucky Republican League clubs, May 1, 1895.]

We believe in the doctrine of protection to American labor, American industries, and American homes; and we attribute the unparalleled business depression of the country to the utter failure of the Democratic Administration in its management of both foreign and domestic affairs, which has created national distrust and general paralysis, has driven capital from the factories and labor into the streets, reduced the revenues of the Government, and increased its bonded indebtedness.

[Ohio Republican, May 28, 1895.]

We denounce the present Democratic Administration, whose vicious and vacillating course has brought us distress at home and humiliation abroad. It has inaugurated a policy looking toward ultimate free trade, which has deranged business, crippled our industries, distressed our homes, and dealt labor a serious blow. With deplorable incompetency it has failed to raise revenue enough to run the Government and has had to borrow, in less than two years, $162,000,000 mainly to pay ordinary running expenses, selling in secret to favored foreign syndicates the bonds of the Government at prices far below their actual value.

[Pennsylvania Republican, August 28, 1895.]

Charges upon the Democratic party the fault for a constantly growing deficit in receipts, as compared with expenditures, thus compelling the borrowing of money in large amounts at exorbitant premiums in time of peace to maintain the credit of the Government. For the failure of the Democratic Administration to provide sufficient revenue to meet the wants of the Government "its responsibility is absolute, and it has exhibited to the world such inability and faithlessness in the discharge of the high trust committed to its care that its history continues to excite the contempt and distrust of all thoughtful citizens."

[Utah Republican, 1895.]

The first State Republican convention of Utah was held at Salt Lake City, August 28, 1895. The platform adopted was as follows:

"We condemn the action of the present national Administration for issuing Government bonds in time of peace to meet a deficit caused by unwise and un-American legislation, and for its unprecedented and unpatriotic coalition with a syndicate of foreign money lenders to procure the sale of Government bonds adversely to the interests of the people."

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, on the threshold of my remarks upon this question I desire to say in behalf of the constituency I have the honor to represent in this House that it is not selfish interest which controls their opinions upon this subject, as has been so repeatedly charged by the advocates of a single gold standard. Neither is it the poverty of our people which causes them to seek for an enlargement of our primary money. In verification of these expressions it is only necessary to refer to the statistics of the last census report, from which it appears that the per capita wealth of the people of the Pacific Coast States and Territories is more than twice the per capita wealth of the average of all of the Eastern States. The State of Idaho stands fourth in the Union in per capita wealth, and the individual citizen of that State, as shown by this census report, is three times wealthier than the individual citizen of Maine and twice as wealthy as the average individual citizen of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and New York. The per capita wealth of our population, as shown by these statistics, which are undisputed, must be proof positive that our people are not so poverty-stricken that they are therefore unreasonable in their demand for more metallic money.

The silver in our State is found either in conjunction with gold or lead in almost every instance, and the mines are of value because these combined products can be marketed at a profit. The fact that our people have been interested in the production of silver has perhaps caused them to give this matter more investigation than the agricultural population of the United States; but I make the assertion, and in so doing believe that I am clearly within the facts, that the agricultural population of the United States has suffered infinitely more from the demonetization of silver than have the silver-producing States and Territories of the Pacific Coast, and the record I have above referred to abundantly proves it. The fact that we are producers of silver has caused our people to investigate the subject and therefore to be more earnestly concerned about it and interested in it than would otherwise be the case. The result of this investigation has convinced these people that the demonetization of silver in 1873 was a national mistake and that no permanent prosperity can come to the United States until our country has returned to true bimetallism.

The conclusion arrived at by our people on this subject after such investigation is not new or original with them, but is the same conclusion that has been reached by the ablest statesmen of our nation since the adoption of the Constitution. It has been the habit of the advocates of a single gold standard, and especially the metropolitan press, to ridicule the financial theories adopted by the advocates of bimetallism, and especially those advocates coming from far Western States. Ridicule needs no reply, for it is not argument. It may be worth while, however, to refer to the fact that such illustrious men as Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, Robert Morris, Jackson, Webster, Clay, Lincoln, Grant, Garfield, Thurman, and Blaine have advocated, in the halls of Congress and elsewhere, the free coinage of silver and gold as basic money. The records which these statesmen have left can be produced to substantiate the truth of this assertion. The gold advocates do not question their patriotism on other matters and have always been the first to refer to them and their records on other questions. It would seem, therefore, that the advocates of bimetallism are not without support in their advocacy of this idea from the statesmen of our country who have gone before.

Mr. Speaker, it is the purpose of my remarks to, as briefly as possible, give reasons for the faith which is in us, and, in order to do this, it is necessary to briefly refer to some historical facts which bear upon the question.

From time immemorial silver and gold have been the money metals of the people of the world. The earliest records of history find them in use, side by side, in all stages of civilization. Until 1816 silver and gold continued to be used as primary money by all civilized nations. During that year England, then the greatest commercial nation in the world, demonetized silver. This was followed by similar legislation in the United States in 1873, Germany in 1874, and shortly thereafter by France, Belgium, Switzerland, Spain, Italy, and Greece.

For a fair consideration of this subject it is necessary, however, to briefly review the legislation of our own country thereon and the status gold and silver occupied at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

THE UNIT OF ACCOUNT.

Bimetallists contend that gold and silver is the money of the Constitution, and that all legislation since that time until 1873 has been enacted with that understanding uppermost in the minds of the legislators. In this connection it may be proper to consider the much mooted question as to what was, at or about the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the monetary unit of account. A representative of the gold-standard people on the floor of this House pretends to believe that gold was the unit of account, or at least that silver was not expressly declared to be this unit by act of Congress. From the best evidence attainable, from the discussions of the question at that time by eminent statesmen, and from contemporaneous history, as well as legislation, it seems to me it is conclusively proven that the silver dollar was the unit of account, and was intended so to be by the early financiers of our Government. All the information on the subject certainly goes to prove that gold was never by anyone at that time considered the metal out of which was to be coined the unit of account. The most that the present friends of a single standard can contend for is that this unit must have been based on both metals. There is so little to verify the correctness of this view and so much to prove the truth of the silver unit, that I shall ask the indulgence of the House to briefly go into the history of the origin of the unit of account.

The friends of silver maintain that the unit of account adopted in the coinage act of 1792 was the Spanish milled dollar, containing 371¼ grains of pure or 416 grains of standard silver, and in support of that contention I will refer to the positions taken thereon by representative financiers and statesmen of that day.

Robert Morris, a man of great learning, and who had devoted much time and labor to the investigation of financial questions, made a report to Congress in 1782. That report urged the necessity for the establishment of a unit of account in our monetary system, and argued that the same was as necessary and essential as other units adopted in the commercial world for the determination and measurement of commodities which were the products of human labor. He discussed at some length the advisability of whether the unit ought to be affixed to gold and silver or to either of them alone, and finally arrived at the following conclusion:

There can be no doubt, therefore, that our money standard ought to be affixed to silver, for the demand which commerce might make for either of the precious metals in preference to the other would vary this real standard from time to time, and in every payment a man would get more or less of real value for his debt, according as he was paid in the coin of greater or less value in relation to the real standard. The purposes of commerce require that the lowest divisible point of money, or what is more properly called the money unit, should be very small.

Mr. Morris measured a unit so small that its practical value was open to very serious question. It appears to have been so infinitesimal that the statesmen of his day did not favor the adoption of it, and it did not meet with the approval of the people. It appears conclusively from the record which he has left us that he personally favored a silver unit.

Thomas Jefferson, in his Notes on the Establishment of a Money Unit and of Coinage for the United States, which appeared at the same time with Mr. Morris's report, and was communicated to Congress in 1782, takes the position that the unit suggested by Mr. Morris would be entirely too small for practical uses, and gives very substantial and conclusive reasons why it ought not to be adopted. After enumerating the requirements which the unit of money ought to possess, Mr. Jefferson says:

The Spanish dollar seems to fulfill all these conditions.

It is apparent from Mr. Jefferson's statement that the contention of the gold-standard advocates of to-day, to wit, that he did not advocate a silver unit, is entirely without foundation, for he plainly advocated the adoption of such a unit and that to correspond in weight with the Spanish milled dollar. Mr. Jefferson further recommends in this communication—

That the money unit of these States shall be equal in value to a Spanish milled dollar; that it shall be divided into tenths and hundredths; that there shall be a coin of silver of the value of the unit, another of the same metal of the value of one-tenth of a unit, one other of copper of the value of one hundredth of a unit; that there shall be a coin of gold of the value of ten units.

It is observable that Mr. Jefferson entirely sustained Mr. Morris on the decimal feature of our notation of money, and that he advocated a silver unit, differing only with him as to the amount of silver which that unit should contain. There was no Spanish milled dollar of gold; there was no dollar of gold in circulation anywhere at that time; there was no piece of gold money which corresponded to the value of the Spanish milled dollar which was then suggested as the unit. In fact, it is not intimated, inferentially or otherwise, by any statesman of that day who gave any consideration to this subject that gold was intended to be the unit of account.

The "Grand Committee on the Money Unit," appointed by Congress in 1785, reported July 6, 1785, to Congress "That the money unit of the United States of America be one dollar," and its report was unanimously adopted.

The Treasury board reported to Congress on the 8th day of April, 1786, recommending as a money unit the silver dollar; and in August of that year Congress adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the money unit of the United States, being by the resolution of Congress of the 6th of July, 1785, a dollar, shall contain of fine silver 375.64 grains. And that there shall be two gold coins, one containing 246.268 grains of fine gold, equal to ten dollars, and to be called an eagle; one containing 123.134 grains of fine gold, equal to five dollars, and to be called a half eagle.

It seems to me that it is conclusively apparent from these references that up until this time there had been no assertion or desire for the double unit of account or for a gold unit.

Alexander Hamilton, perhaps the greatest financier of his day and one of the greatest statesmen America has ever produced, in his report on the establishment of a United States mint, presented to Congress in April, 1791, says:

Contrary to the ideas which have heretofore prevailed in the suggestions concerning a coinage for the United States, though not without much hesitation, arising from a difference from those ideas, the Secretary is, upon the whole, strongly inclined to the opinion that the preference ought to be given to neither of the metals for the money idea. It seems to be the most advisable, as has been observed, not to attach the unit exclusively to either of the metals, because this can not be done effectively without destroying the features and character of one of them as money and reducing it to the situation of mere merchandise. * * *

The conclusion to be drawn from the observations which have been made on the subject is this: That the unit in the coins of the United States ought to correspond with 24¼ grains of pure gold and with 371¼ grains of pure silver, each answering to a dollar in the money of account. * * * On this plan the unit in money of account will continue to be a dollar and its multiples—dimes, cents, and mills, or tenths, hundredths, and thousandths.

It will be observed from the foregoing that the ratio which this report established was practically 15 of silver to 1 of gold.

The coinage act of 1792, which was adopted by the Congress, reads as follows:

SEC. 9. That there shall be, from time to time, struck and coined at the said mint coins of gold, silver, or copper of the following denominations, values, and descriptions, viz: Eagles, each to be of the value of ten dollars or units, and to contain 247½ grains of pure or 270 grains of standard gold; half eagles, each to be of the value of five dollars, and to contain 123⅝ grains of pure or 135 grains of standard gold; quarter eagles, each to be of the value of two dollars and a half dollar, and to contain 61¼ grains of pure or 67½ grains of standard gold; dollars or units, each to be of the value of the Spanish milled dollar, as the same is now current, and to contain 371¼ grains of pure or 416 grains of standard silver.

While Mr. Hamilton may have inclined to the belief that there should be two units of account, a gold dollar and a silver dollar, each of specified weight, or, to express the same thing in another way, one unit the material of which was to be silver and another unit the material of which was to be gold, and while his report would tend to show that this was his view of the matter, nevertheless we must not lose sight of the fact that Mr. Jefferson, the grand committee referred to, the board of Treasury report, and many of the statesmen of that day had given this matter careful consideration, that it was a question of vital importance to the whole people and must have been considered by them and by their representatives generally at that time. It is, therefore, only fair to assume that other influences besides those of Mr. Hamilton—which we will admit must have been powerful—had to do with concentrating the opinions and thought of the day on this question into the statute of 1792, and that those opinions, except Mr. Hamilton's, were unquestionably in favor of a silver unit of the weight of a Spanish milled dollar. When we consider that Mr. Hamilton was not averse to this unit, but in fact approved of it, while insisting on the gold unit as well, it is only fair to assume that the coinage act of 1792 reflected the sentiments of the statesmen of that day and meant just what it said, although in this reflection and meaning it may have necessitated a compromise of Mr. Hamilton's views to some extent. That act does not declare that there is a gold unit or that any piece of gold money shall constitute a unit; it never refers to the gold unit in any way except to say—

Eagles, each to be of the value of ten dollars or units—

While it does say that there shall be coined—dollars or units, each to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar as the same is now current, and to contain 371¼ grains of pure or 416 grains of standard silver.

In other words, the positive and unequivocal requirement of this statute is that there shall be established and created a silver dollar which shall be the unit of account, while the statute nowhere says, inferentially or otherwise, that such a gold dollar shall be created. On the contrary, it simply measures the value of that gold dollar in units, and these units are silver dollars created by the same act. How any friend of the single gold standard can deduct from history and the record of this legislation the conclusion that—is past finding out. Moreover, if the position which the gold advocates take on this question were true, it certainly does not help their cause, for it would simply establish a bimetallic union or standard, which the friends of silver now contend for. It is plain, however, that this was not the intention of the fathers of our country in framing financial legislation for the people; that it was not the result of their best thought and investigation.

This act was intended to attach the money unit to gold and silver alike—

I have therefore gone into this question of the unit of account with this detail for the purpose of showing that the much-despised white metal of to-day was good enough to be made the unit of account by our forefathers, who were considered to be the wisest statesmen of their day and generation, and who have not had superiors in the flight of time since.

REVIEW OF OUR FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.

Mr. Speaker, the next legislation in our country succeeding the act of 1792, creating the mint, was the act of June 28, 1834, which reduced the quantity of gold in the gold coin, and made the ten-dollar piece contain 232 grains of pure gold, one-tenth of which would be 23.2 grains as constituting the gold dollar. This act therefore changed the ratio from 15 to 1 to practically 16 to 1.

The act of January 18, 1837, made the coins nine-tenths pure and one-tenth alloy; the silver dollar 371¼ grains of pure silver, or 412½ grains of standard silver.

The act of February 21, 1853, reduced the amount of silver in subsidiary coin, so that the half dollar contained 192 grains of standard silver and the other subsidiary coins in the same proportion. By the same act the legal-tender quality of the subsidiary coins was limited to $5, but the silver dollar was yet of full legal tender.

The act of February 21, 1857, authorized the recoinage of all foreign subsidiary coin and repealed prior acts which made them legal tender.

The act of February 12, 1873, omitted the silver dollar from our coinage laws and made the gold dollar of 23.22 grains of pure gold, or 25.8 grains of standard gold, the unit of account.

The act of Februry 28, 1878, known as the "Bland-Allison Act," provided for the purchase of not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 worth of silver monthly, and that such silver should be coined into standard dollars of 412½ grains each of standard silver as provided in the act of January 18, 1837.

The act of July 14, 1890, known as the "Sherman law," authorized the purchase by the Government of 4,500,000 ounces of silver monthly and the issuance of Treasury notes in payment therefor. These notes were redeemable in coin at the discretion of the Secretary and were legal tender. It also required the Secretary of the Treasury to coin each month 2,000,000 ounces of silver so purchased into standard silver dollars until the 1st day of July, 1891, and after that time to coin as much as might be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes therein provided for. The purchasing clause of that act was repealed November 1, 1893, and we have had no legislation affecting silver since, so that to-day we are on a single gold standard and silver is practically without legislation in this or any other great commercial country making it primary money.

TRUE BIMETALLISM.

Mr. Speaker, the true bimetallists contend for the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the ratio of 1 to 16 by the United States, acting independently of all other nations.

As the opponents of this doctrine practically all admit that the great commercial nations of the world, acting together, could coin these metals without limit, it is unnecessary for me to go into a discussion of the advisability of free coinage in this manner. I will, therefore, chiefly confine my remarks to the propriety of this country entering upon the free and unlimited coinage of both metals independently.

RATIO.

First let us consider the ratio. While the matter of the ratio is not one that goes to the principle of bimetallism, nevertheless some fixed ratio must be agreed upon by the friends of free coinage, and by almost universal consent the ratio of 16 to 1 (exact mint ratio, 15⅝⅝ to 1) has been considered the proper one for adoption. In support of the contention that this has been substantially the commercial ratio prior to 1873, financial statistics establish beyond doubt that for all the time during which the world took a careful account this ratio was practically maintained. It is noticeable that a marked change took place in the commercial ratio with the demonetization of silver in 1873, and that silver has been falling in value ever since as compared with gold, until the ratio is now about 30 to 1. We maintain that this record subsequent to 1873 furnishes absolutely no criterion by which to judge the merits of either metal as basic money, because during this latter period silver was denied its proper mintage rights by the United States and every other great commercial nation.

It is unfair, unjust, and illogical to criticise the white metal for its failure to maintain its ratio with gold after all of the great money-using nations of the world had destroyed it and taken away its function as money. The law of supply and demand controls the value of gold and silver as it does every other product of human industry. Half of the world's demand for gold and silver is now and always has been created by the laws which attach a money function to these metals. On the other hand, half of the demand has been given to them by virtue of their use in the arts; and when we take away 50 per cent of this demand for one of the metals, and the supply thereof remains practically the same, manifestly it must fall as compared with the other, for which there is a constant limited demand in the arts and an unlimited demand at the mints of the world. If gold had been demonetized in 1873 and silver had remained basic money, it must be apparent to even the unthinking that the ratio between silver and gold would have been inversely as much disturbed.

NO DEMAND FOR THE DEMONETIZATION OF SILVER.

Aside from the evils of the demonetization act, it may not be inopportune to say that there was absolutely no demand for such legislation in 1873 or at any time prior thereto from the American people, and had the people understood that their representatives were attempting the enactment of such a law there would have been a protest against it from the entire country. The time selected for this legislation was peculiarly opportune. There was practically no metallic money in circulation at that time. The paper circulation, issued of necessity during the war, had prevented our return to specie payments until 1879. Moreover, the Congress itself did not understand that any such legislation was being attempted. The most conspicuous members of Congress in 1873 have so stated, and it may be proper to refer to some of them now.

Senator Thurman, on February 15, 1878 (volume 7, part 2, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, page 1064, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD), said that he thought the bill in question was simply a bill to reform the mint laws.

Senator Conkling's inquiry in the Senate on March 30, 1876 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 4, part 3, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, page 2062), established that he had no conception of such legislation at the time. Senator Hereford said in the Senate, February 13, 1878, that he did not so understand the bill; likewise Senator Howe, February 5, 1878, and Senators VOORHEES and Blaine on February 15, 1878.

In the House it may be said that the true meaning and purport of the bill was likewise not understood. General Garfield did not so understand it. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 7, part 1, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, page 989.)

Neither did Mr. Bright. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 7, part 1, second session Forty-fifth Congress, page 584.)

Nor Mr. Holman. (CON GRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 4, part 6, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, Appendix, page 193.)

Nor Mr. CANNON. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 4, part 6, Forty-fourth Congress, Appendix, page 197.)

Nor Mr. Kelley of Pennsylvania. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 7, part 2, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, page 1605.)

It therefore appears from the record that not only did the people fail to understand what their lawmakers were doing when silver was demonetized, but that their representatives in Congress did not understand it. It seems incredulous that an act so far-reaching as this, which was not demanded by the people, nor approved by the people, and not even indorsed by Congress knowingly, should yet remain upon the statute books to disgrace the methods of legislation in the United States. Nevertheless, so far it has been impossible to secure its repeal. The same influences which forced England to demonetize silver in 1816 have been producing their effects in our country.

ENGLAND'S REASONS FOR THE GOLD STANDARD.

In this connection it may be interesting to know the reason England's greatest statesman gave why that country could never consent to a return to bimetallism. Mr. Gladstone, in a speech delivered in Parliament on a motion to reconvene the International Monetary Conference in March, 1883, said:

I suppose there is not a year which passes over our heads which does not largely add to the mass of British investments abroad. I am almost afraid to estimate the total amount of the property which the United Kingdom holds beyond the limits of the United Kingdom, but of this I am well convinced, that it is not to be counted by tens or hundreds of millions. One thousand millions of pounds ($5,000,000,000) probably would be an extremely low and inadequate estimate. Two thousand millions ($10,000,000,000), or something even more than that, is very likely to be nearer the mark.

I have a profound admiration for cosmopolitan principles. I can go a great length in moderation, in recommending their recognition and establishment, but if there are these two thousand millions ($10,000,000,000) or fifteen hundred millions ($7,500,000,000) of money which we have got abroad, it is a very serious matter as between this country and other countries.

We have nothing to pay them; we are not debtors at all; we should get no comfort, no consolation out of the substitution of an inferior material, of a cheaper money, which we could obtain for less and part with for more. We should get no consolation, but the consolation throughout the world would be great.

The foregoing utterances give a complete exposition of the views entertained by those controlling national affairs in creditor England and of those individuals who constitute the creditor class in this country, although they are rarely uttered with the same frankness.

ENLARGEMENT OF OUR BASIC MONEY NECESSARY.

Mr. Speaker, bimetallists contend that there is not enough basic money in the United States to do the business of our country. Basic money practically measures the value of all things and determines prices of all staple products, because all other money issued must be redeemed in it. It is a well-recognized principle of finance that the aggregate of money in circulation determines prices.

It therefore follows of necessity that a decrease of our primary money is simply a contraction of our currency of the very worst kind and must result in lowering prices. It is advisable here to consider a feature of this question which has seriously vexed bimetallists from time immemorial, to wit, the clamor for irredeemable money. Theoretically, silk-ribbed paper may be a perfect money, but practically it has always resulted in disaster to the nation which issued it, unless its redemption in coin was provided for. The reason for this is that the financial world lacks confidence that there will be a limit to an issue of this kind of money.

Legislative bodies are prone to an overissue, and the success of a limited issue has uniformly brought about an overissue sooner or later. This is the experience of all nations where this experiment has been tried. The Creator of the universe has placed a limit upon the production of the precious metals. This limit is fixed by nature, and it is not given unto man to pass it or disregard it. The precious metals are concealed in the unyielding rock in the bowels of the earth, and are only wrested therefrom by man's energy under great privation and toil, and in limited quantities. The experience of ages teaches, therefore, that it is safer to trust to the limit placed upon the production of money material by nature rather than to the limit which the judgment of finite man would prescribe in legislative bodies. It is this principle which underlies the theory of metallic money made out of the precious metals.

From the earliest record in the world, by universal consent, the nations of the world have recognized the virtues and the necessities of this metallic money. The production of these metals has kept pace with the wants of man throughout Christendom from the time he first began to barter until to-day, and judging the future from the past, it is fair to assume that their production will continue to supply his wants in the matter of a proper medium of exchange. For the foregoing reasons true bimetallists can have no lot or part with those who believe in irredeemable paper money. I will therefore refer briefly at this point to our Populist friends, who have under false pretenses secured some recognition as bimetallists.

THE RECORD OF THE POPULIST PARTY ON THE MONEY QUESTION.

The honest advocates of bimetallism in the United States have been seriously handicapped by the advocates of irredeemable paper money in the past. The Greenback party had an ephemeral existence, and did what harm it could in this respect, but it has long since taken the course of all political organizations advocating the creation of irredeemable paper money by the National Government. The organization most conspicuous along these lines now is the so-called Populist party or People's Party. This party has had a more or less precarious existence for four or five years, but has never attained standing in the great centers of population in the United States. Judging from the votes it has polled at the elections for the last three or four years, it is not destined to become a national party. It is not so strong to-day in the Eastern States as the Prohibition party, and if the claims of the Western members of the Populist party—to wit, that it is a free-coinage party—are true, there would be no hope of its ever accomplishing this purpose, because it has had sufficient trial now to demonstrate that it will not become a national political organization of strength sufficient to enable it to enact its theories and ideas into legislation.

In the middle West it had a temporary success, particularly in Kansas and Nebraska, where its calamity incantations brought to the surface some unique characters. Its greatest success has been in the area of country between the Mississippi River on the east and the Rocky Mountains on the west. If it has any claim to existence as a national organization those claims must be based on the record and accomplishment of this party in the area last designated. If the advocates of bimetallism hope to receive aid and assistance from this political organization, it is fair that they should judge it from the record which its members from this district have made, because this district practically includes all of the area where that party has been successful.

POPULISTS IN FAVOR OF FREE TRADE.

In the Fifty-third Congress this party had 10 members in the lower House. All of these members voted for the Wilson bill as it originally passed the House of Representatives. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-third Congress, second session, volume 138, page 1796.) That bill practically destroyed the sheep industry and the lead-mining industry of the Rocky Mountain region, because it practically put lead and wool on the free list. It injured every other industry of the people which I represent, yet every Populist member supported it. This bill was materially modified in the Senate and many of the fangs of the monster were there extracted by Democratic assistance, and I therefore assert that the Populist party is now, and from that record was, more of a free-trade party than is the Democratic party.

Now, is its claim to be a free-silver party worthy of consideration, and by virtue of that claim is it entitled to receive support from a people profoundly confident of the correctness of that principle? To this I answer, "No." The Populist party is not now and never has been a believer in the principle of bimetallism; it is not now and never has been a believer in metallic money of ultimate redemption; it does not believe in a metallic basis for our money issue. On the contrary, it is a fiat money party. It is a political organization which believes the United States should issue irredeemable paper money; that the edict of the Government alone makes money, and that there is no necessity for the use of gold and silver as money. I make the assertion that the Populist party has advocated the free coinage of silver solely because it would increase our circulating medium; in other words, that it would make more money; that it would take in a commodity out of which more money might be made, and not from an honest desire for true bimetallism. In support of these statements I refer to the records of the leaders of the Populist party, because it is from these records that we have a right to judge that political organization, and not from what may be proclaimed by some individual members of it who have never had an opportunity to make a record for or against anything.

Senator PEFFER of Kansas is unquestionably the leader of the Populist party in the United States, and is so recognized in the Senate and out of it. He has introduced a number of bills on the money question, which show what he and his party would do if they had the power. I will mention a few of them.

August 14, 1893, Mr. PEFFER introduced a bill "to increase the circulating medium by issuing Treasury notes payable in lawful money of the United States." The Secretary, under that bill, is directed to prepare irredeemable Treasury notes aggregating $300,000,000, and they are declared to be full legal tender.

On the 16th of August, 1893, Mr. PEFFER introduced "A bill to authorize the issue of $600,000,000 of money, and for other purposes." Under that bill the Secretary is directed to prepare $600,000,000 of declaratory legal-tender money made of aluminium or silk-threaded paper. There is no redemption provided for.

On August 21, 1893, Mr. PEFFER introduced "A bill to provide for the immediate issue and circulation of Treasury notes." The Secretary, under this bill, is directed to prepare immediately Treasury notes to the amount of $250,000,000. They are made payable in lawful money, and are declared to be of full legal tender. No redemption.

On October 1, 1893, Mr. PEFFER introduced "A bill to provide for the employment of labor and the prosperity of the people of the United States, and for other purposes." Under this bill the Secretary is directed to have prepared and issued six thousand millions of dollars and cover the same into the Treasury. The bill also appropriates $600,000,000 to be loaned to the States and Territories in proportion to the inhabitants thereof, to be expended for the improvement of public highways, etc. There is no redemption for this vast issue of money provided in the bill.

On the 19th of March, 1894, Mr. PEFFER introduced "A bill to provide for the improvement of public roads, and for other purposes." This bill authorized the Secretary to have engraved five hundred millions of Treasury notes; they are declared to be full legal tender, and no redemption is provided for; said notes to be expended for the improvement of public roads.

On the 13th of April, 1894, Mr. PEFFER introduced "A bill to provide for the issue of Treasury notes to be loaned to States, counties, townships, municipalities, villages, and individual citizens." This bill instructed the Secretary to have engraved two thousand five hundred millions of dollars, Treasury notes; declared them to be full legal tender, and provided for no redemption in coin or otherwise. This money was to be loaned to the people on mortgage security. In this bill land was declared to be of no value and free of any price whatever, the buildings and improvements alone being declared of value.

This makes an aggregate issue, if the bills of the Populist Senator had become law, of ten thousand one hundred and fifty millions of dollars of irredeemable paper money. This is $145 for each man, woman, and child in the United States, more money than the whole world possesses to-day. There is absolutely no suggestion in any of these bills that a dollar of this vast issue shall ever be redeemed in gold or silver or anything else; but it is fiat money pure and simple.

Mr. ALLEN, of Nebraska, a more conservative member of the Populist party, introduced February 6, 1894, in the Senate "A bill authorizing and directing the issue of an increased volume of constitutional legal-tender money." Under this bill the Secretary was directed to prepare $500,000,000 legal-tender notes, which were to be redeemed in lawful money of the United States in ten years. In other words, they were redeemable in this or any other issue of irredeemable money which might be made, which must be apparent to even the unthinking is not redemption at all.

That these bills reflect the sentiments and wishes of the Populist party is proven by the declarations of the representatives of that party in various speeches which were delivered both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the United States. I shall now refer to some of these declarations, which can be verified by a reference to the RECORD:

Senator PEFFER said, in a speech delivered June 13, 1892, that "paper money was just as good as any other money."

Mr. PEFFER also said in a speech in the Senate, printed in the RECORD under date of August 24, 1893:

So far as I am concerned, I had rather see all of our coinage laws wiped out, place gold and silver on the markets the same as we do wheat and corn and cotton; let the Government purchase every dollar's worth of both metals which is offered, and as long as the people want silver and gold to rest their paper upon, lay it away and let it rest as a basis without abrasion, and without counterfeiting, and without any sort of change whatever. The time is not far distant when the people will discover that they do not need any gold or silver to base their paper upon.

Mr. PEFFER introduced an amendment to the bill for repeal of the Sherman law October 29, 1893, which directed the Secretary of the Treasury to have prepared $250,000,000 of Treasury notes, declaring them to be legal tender and lawful money, but not providing for any redemption of them in gold or silver. In advocating this amendment, as appears by the RECORD of that date, he said, in answer to a question from Senator HOAR, that this proposed issue of money was redeemable in lawful money, whether that money was irredeemable paper money or any kind of money, and in support of that amendment, providing for the issue of irredeemable paper money, all of the Populist Senators, to wit, ALLEN, IRBY, KYLE, PEFFER, and STEWART, voted "aye."

August 21, 1893, Mr. Davis, a Populist member from Kansas, during the discussion on the bill to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, said:

Mr. Speaker, I have shown that gold is not a "sound and stable currency." I have shown that silver is less fickle and far safer than gold. I have shown that bimetallism is a better basis for a "sound and stable currency" than either gold or silver alone, and finally, I have shown you a still safer, sounder, and more stable money system, not based on gold alone, or silver alone, or even on gold and silver combined, but on all commodities of commerce.

He further says in said speech:

It is not possible for a great and growing nation to depend with certainty on the irregular and declining productions of the gold and silver mines of the world for "a sound and stable currency," which shall maintain a full and even flow of prices, subject only to the supply and demand of commodities. A metallic currency, for the sake of argument, may be reckoned sound, but if it can not prevent the perpetual decline of prices it can not be rightfully considered stable.

He also says in said speech:

All things considered, no material seems so well adapted to practical business purposes as well executed paper notes. The material is easy of procurement, reasonably durable, and easy to transport, count, and handle in large or small amounts. It is easy to conceal about the person, being small of bulk and light of weight. * * * Intrinsic or commercial value in the material which is endowed with the monetary function is not only unnecessary, but it should be further stated that such intrinsic value is a great and sometimes fatal objection to the money material.

Senator JAMES H. KYLE, of South Dakota, in a speech delivered in the United States Senate October 2, 1893, said:

Along the highways of history are finger boards pointing to the folly of a currency dug out of the ground at a great expense and so scarce as to cause stagnation to all lines of industry. There is a growing sentiment, Mr. President, among the people of our nation that we may readily discard both gold and silver and adopt a new circulating medium which is more convenient, and it will not, like the present standard, be currency only in name. Very little business is done with gold and silver. If we were limited to-day in our currency to gold and silver every branch of business from coast to coast would be in stagnation. A metal basis is a delusion calculated to blind the masses and enrich the few. Treasury notes are the people's money, based not upon the output of this or that mine, but on the wealth of the nation. All this goes to prove that money is money if the creation of law, no matter of what material made, so long as a strong Government is behind it. I am not able to discover why we should be compelled, in order merely to procure a circulating medium, to search the bowels of the earth and tax the resources of our people, when a most excellent and desirable article is at hand.

He further says in said speech:

Exchange of dollars is not redemption and never can be. A dollar is redeemed when it is received in revenue by the Government issuing it, and not otherwise.

In speaking of this plan, he further says in the same speech:

It is the economic system of the future by which financial standards will be solved when legislators and nations have become enlightened and when we have become tired of quarreling over these so-called precious metals, which are but one degree removed from the cowrie shells of the barbarian.

Jerry Simpson, the most conspicuous apostle of Populism who has yet served in the House of Representatives, stated in a speech printed in the RECORD, under date of August 20, 1893, that—

Those who believe with me and my party hold the position that it does not matter what material your money is made of. We hold to the position that money is the representative of the value of all things, and so long as society—and I take it all gentlemen here understand the Government to be a mere cooperative society—so long as society agrees by statute law to select one of these things as money and receive it in payment of all debts, public and private, it will pass for money. That is what we understand it to mean; and so whether you select gold or silver, or any other commodity, you are sure to have a fluctuating currency, because the article that it is based upon will fluctuate according to supply and demand.

Mr. Simpson, in a speech delivered in the House of Representatives February 15, 1894, on the seigniorage bill, said:

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am for the passage of this bill, first, because it is a step in the right direction, because it takes in another commodity to stand behind your currency. I am one of those old fiat greenback lunatics that you used to hear about. I believe that this Government, with all its wealth and resources, can issue a currency based upon the entire wealth of the people that will be more secure than any currency based on either gold or silver, and I am for silver coinage because it takes in another commodity.

January 5, 1892, Mr. Simpson introduced in the House "A bill (H. R. 135) to establish a department of finance and commerce, and for other purposes." This bill, after providing for Government grain warehouses and the loaning of Government money on grain and other agricultural products and on farm lands at 2 per cent per annum, further provides as follows:

SEC. 15. One year from and after the passage of this act the coinage of gold and silver coins above the denomination of 25 cents shall cease, and three years from the date of the passage of this act such coins shall no longer be a legal tender, and the United States shall provide for the redemption of all such coins at their face value by exchanging them for legal-tender paper money, and manufacture them into bars and keep the same on sale.

Mr. Hudson, a Populist member of the Fifty-third Congress, from Kansas, in speaking on the bill to repeal the Sherman law, August 19, 1893, referring to the Populists, said:

While they do not believe that the free coinage of silver will give them the immediate relief which is now needed, they believe that it will gradually but certainly give them more money. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-third Congress, first session, volume 133, page 511.)

The foregoing is a partial record which the Populist party has made on the money question in Congress, and it must be apparent to the most casual observer that this record proves beyond the possibility of a doubt that this political organization has no use for a metallic basis for the money issues of our Government, but, on the contrary, is absolutely committed to the idea of an irredeemable paper currency.

As an evidence of what might be expected from some of the political freaks who belong to this party in the East, if it ever met with success there, I shall refer to an interview with the so-called Gen. Jacob S. Coxey, of Commonweal fame, published in the Washington Star, under date of November 26, 1895, when Mr. Coxey was in this city. In response to the question whether he was affiliated with the Populist party, he responded in the affirmative, stating:

My chief desire is to get the idea—

Referring to his bond bill—in the platform, and if the man goes with it, all well and good. The old leaders of the Populist party are not, I am sorry to say, entirely favorable to the bond bill, and, in my opinion, are wasting time figuring on the silver question. My investigations have led me to the belief that the rank and file of the party are with me. They want more money in circulation, and they do not intend to wait for the slow process of the mine. They demand that the printing presses be put to work, and the quicker the wheels begin to turn the better they will be suited.

Mr. Coxey was the Populist candidate for Congress in his district three years ago, and last year was the nominee of that party for governor of Ohio and received 52,000 votes, so it is fair to assume that he voiced at least the Eastern sentiment of his party on the financial question.

It therefore follows that the advocates of bimetallism have nothing to expect from a party controlled by a leadership whose sentiments on this question are those outlined above. Nevertheless, there will ultimately come such a profound awakening on this subject that the people will force the issue of the free coinage of silver to such an extent that it will finally triumph.

CAUSE OF DISPARITY.

Mr. Speaker, the friends of a single standard cite the market price of gold as stationary, and the market price of silver as fluctuating, in order to show the fallacy of attempting to use both of these metals as basic money. The statement of a proposition so absurd as that should need no refutation. Gold to-day enjoys an unlimited market. The law of the United States makes 25.8 grains of standard gold a dollar, and this dollar measures the value of everything produced in the United States, including silver bullion. Given an unlimited demand for an article at a fixed price with a limited supply, and it necessarily follows, as the night the day, that the price so fixed will be maintained.

Silver enjoys no such advantage as this. We have a constantly increasing supply of silver and a limited demand in the arts and practically no demand for it as a money metal. Its value, therefore, is fluctuating, as is the value of every other staple product under like conditions. Abandonment of silver and the substitution of gold alone as the primary money of the world was not the result of the application of the law of natural selection known as the "survival of the fittest," but was the result of concerted action of those whose interest it was to contract the volume of primary money throughout the world. Notwithstanding the demonetization of silver, its value has remained practically stationary compared with all staple products of human toil. It has not decreased when measured in wheat, corn, cotton, or any other staple product; but gold, when measured in these products, has doubled in value since that time.

THE HISTORY OF FRANCE PROVES THE BIMETALLIC PRINCIPLE.

When England demonetized silver she was the greatest money-using and commercial nation in the world. Yet even that terrible blow at the white metal did not result in its destruction. The commercial ratio existing throughout the world between gold and silver was scarcely disturbed by that legislative enactment. The stability of the value of silver and the advisability of its use as a money metal could not have received better indorsement than the result of that action has established for it. For almost sixty years thereafter the ratio between gold and silver was maintained throughout the world. Our country was not then ranked as a great commercial nation; it was not ranked as a great money-using nation. France, however, at that time enjoyed that distinction preeminently, and it is to the action of the French people that we are indebted for the most positive proof of the stability of silver as a money metal. France accorded silver equal rights with gold to entry at her mints during this long period, and France, by virtue of her unlimited mint demand for silver, maintained its ratio with gold notwithstanding England's antagonism. There is no fact better established in history than this. No other nation aided France in doing this, for the reason that the French ratio differed from that of other nations, and it was their ratio which controlled the market price of silver.

The people of France did not demand cooperation from other countries in order to maintain silver as basic money, and yet in 1874, when the interest gatherers and money changers of that nation had secured such power that they compelled the overthrow of silver there, France had in metallic money $900,000,000 of gold and $700,000,000 of silver in circulation. Bimetallism had not driven gold from France, but, on the contrary, had secured for her a bounteous supply of both metals, gold in greater abundance than silver. If France could accomplish this during more than a half century of time, when her population was less than 35,000,000 souls and her wealth and resources infinitesimal when compared with ours, then we contend that this nation, with a population of more than 70,000,000 people, with an area of more than 3,600,000 square miles, and with resources, production, and consumption greater than any other people on the earth, can surely do the same thing.

The vastness in area has much to do with the wants of the people, so far as primary money is concerned. A dense population congested in a small area of country, with effete notions and fixed habits, does not demand the circulating medium that the same population would in a country of vast area whose resources are largely undeveloped. It is contended by the gold advocates that the business of the world is done by checks and that a very small per cent of it is done with actual money. This is true, to a limited extent, in the great centers of population. The exchanges in London and New York are unquestionably performed in this way, but in all fairness these clearing-house exchanges do not represent the business of the world. The vast daily transactions among the people, in which an exchange of commodities is brought about, constitute the business of a nation.

This business is done not by checks, but by actual money. It is not checks which move the crops, but actual money, as is well known and appreciated by all financiers. When this season is on there is always a scarcity of metallic money; checks do not answer. The great wealth-producing sections of our country, notably the Mississippi Valley, the granary of the world, require actual money in the daily transactions of life. Therefore I say that if France, during that long period of time, with a dense population and a limited area of resources which were developed, could alone maintain the parity between gold and silver by independent coinage at her mint ratio as against all the world, then the United States, occupying its vantage ground in the financial world and with its unlimited resources, can certainly accomplish the same end.

SILVER MONOMETALLISM NOT THE RESULT OF BIMETALLISM.

Mr. Speaker, it is contended, however, that if our country adopts bimetallism, independently, that the result must be silver monometallism, because gold will be higher valued than silver and will leave the United States for Europe by virtue of the operation of the so-called Gresham law. The experience of France, just referred to, proves the incorrectness of this assertion, but for the purposes of this argument alone grant for a moment that the claim of the gold advocates is true. We have, according to the last mint report, about $600,000,000 in gold in the United States. If a return to bimetallism will drive this amount of money out of our country it surely must increase correspondingly the quantity of the world's money in Europe, where we find a market for our surplus staple products, wheat, cotton, petroleum, etc. This would nhance the value of these products enormously abroad, and consequently at home, bringing increased prosperity to all of the people of the United States, a calamity surely not to be dreaded by the American people.

The large exportation of these products necessarily following as a result of this, and the limited importations which it is claimed would take place by a refusal of foreign countries to accept our silver, must certainly result in an immense balance of trade in our favor, which balance would either have to be settled in gold or silver. If settled in silver, it would consume all of the surplus silver of Europe, and more, during a single season; if settled in gold, it would of necessity bring our gold back, and sooner or later much more would follow it. This, it seems to me, would be the logical result of such a condition, even if the worst should come and gold should leave us as predicted by the enemies of bimetallism. However, there is nothing to base such a prediction on. The lessons of history are against it. The clear understanding and logic of the situation is against it. Moreover, under bimetallism the United States could protect its basic money constituting its reserve, as the Bank of France has uniformly done, if that became necessary, by paying in that coin of which its Treasury was most extensively possessed at the time the demand was made and by refusing to pay in gold when the demand for that coin was made for the purpose of export.

It is further claimed by the gold advocates that the world's production of silver and gold has varied so much in the past, comparing one with the other, that it is unsafe now to return to bimetallism. They especially cite the variance existing since 1873. Let us examine the situation and see if it is reasonable to have any fears from this source. What is the light of history on this feature of it?

In the year 1818 the world's production of silver was forty-six times the world's production of gold; yet France coined seven times the amount of gold that year that she did silver, and France was the only great nation on a bimetallic basis.

In 1852 the world's production of silver was four and one-half times that of gold; yet France coined five times as much silver as gold during that year, and the French mints were open to the unlimited coinage of both metals.

From 1821 to 1830 the world's production of silver was thirty-two times that of gold, yet France controlled the world's price of silver, maintained the parity, and made identical the commercial and mint values of these metals by her open mints. If she could do this single handed and alone when the production of silver as compared with gold was as 32 to 1, is it unreasonable to suppose that the United States could have accomplished the same thing in 1894, when the production of silver as compared with gold was as 19 to 1? In 1853 French financiers became alarmed at the enormous production of gold in the world, and especially in the United States, and feared that the parity could not be maintained between the two metals; yet the result shows that it was so maintained, and the commercial and mint ratio of both metals was that year, and remained until 1873, practically 15½ to 1, the mint ratio established by France.

NO FEARS OF A DELUGE OF SILVER UNDER BIMETALLISM.

Mr. Speaker, if this nation adopted independent bimetallism, the coined silver of France, England, Germany, and other European nations would not leave those countries to settle affairs of trade with us which would necessarily result, for the reason that the coined silver of France is overvalued at 3 per cent as compared with our silver at the contemplated ratio of 16 to 1, while the silver coin of Germany and the other nations is about the same as that of France, and that of England is 13 per cent higher than ours. It is therefore absurd to say that the coined silver of European nations would be shipped here as a result of bimetallism. Some alarmists claim that their plate and manufactured articles would be melted and dumped upon us in the shape of bullion. If such an absurd statement needs any reply, it is simply to say that the silver in the plate would be more valuable than silver bullion here, because it would possess the mint value there, plus transportation charges here and the value of the labor which fashioned it into the works of art.

IS SILVER MONEY UNPOPULAR?

Bimetallists are sometimes confronted with the statement that the people will not use silver on account of its bulk and the inconvenience of carrying it, and consequently it is unfit for use as standard money. History does not bear out the truth of this statement, but on the contrary very substantially controverts it. Silver has always been popular with the people. The silver dollar has been uniformly known as the "dollar of the people." Their transactions in life are usually small and the dollar is useful as a medium of exchange for most of them. It therefore has uniformly been popular and never has been rejected by the people, so far as history goes. But if the demonetization of silver almost a generation ago has prejudiced the masses of the people against silver to such an extent that they prefer to use paper money, there unquestionably would be no objection from bimetallists to the gratification of the people's desire in this respect, if it existed, both as regards gold and silver.

Bimetallists do not contend that there shall be no other money in circulation under a bimetallic standard except gold and silver. On the contrary, I think they all advocate the issuance of certificates redeemable in coin for every dollar deposited with the Treasury, when the same is demanded. In other words, the money of the country under bimetallism would consist of every dollar's worth of gold bullion brought to the Treasury coined at the rate of 25.8 grains standard gold for a dollar, and every dollar's worth of silver coined at the rate of 412½ grains standard silver for a dollar, and the issuance of this money, either as gold and silver coined or in the shape of coin certificates, as above stated.

I have given you some of the reasons why we believe in bimetallism, as I promised. Let them be met and controverted by argument and not by vituperation and abuse. The people are alive to the issue and will force it to a settlement. I congratulate the country that the advocates of a gold standard have been deployed into the open and are not longer permitted to masquerade as bimetallists. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] is recognized.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes before the House certainly under very exceptional circumstances, to say nothing about the principle upon which it depends. After a careful examination and a fair amount of discussion the House sent over to the Senate Chamber a bill calculated to meet the requirements of the Government as to the loan of money and as to the means of supplying deficiencies in the revenues of the United States. It was intended and expected that this bill would receive the approval of the Senate, as being well adapted for the production of those results; but it comes back to us with a line drawn through every word of the bill, and an entirely new bill added to what was supposed and believed to be so thoroughly adapted to the situation of the country at the time of its passage here.

This bill as it now comes before the House is substantially one of those sporadic efforts that have been so frequently made by which silver is to be coined without limit or restriction upon a ration of 16 to 1. At no time, when a similar proposition has been brought before the House of coining silver upon this ratio, has silver found so low an estimate or price in the commercial operations of the world. It has sunk step by step from the time when it began to fail to keep up its ratio to gold as a money metal until to-day its relation commercially with the gold coinage of the United States is about 50 cents on the dollar; and it is with this commercial valuation, and that is the only thing in its favor, that is now proposed by the Senate of the United States and recommended to this House that a policy shall be adopted of providing for the free and unlimited coinage of silver upon this ratio.

It might be very well, to meet the exigencies of business and the progress of affairs in this country, to provide from time to time for the coinage of a certain amount of silver coin, more especially that of a subsidiary character, bearing a fair relation to the commercial value of the bullion itself; but no proposition has been made to meet the exigencies or to supply the people with circulating coin under circumstances of this character and of this description. On the other hand, a proposition is made, and insisted upon without qualification, and under no circumstances apparently to be abandoned, that we shall resort again to the coinage of the silver dollar without reference to any other form of silver coinage upon this ratio of 16 to 1. We are asked through the instrumentality of this bill to provide for the coinage of silver of this proportionate valuation, notwithstanding the fact that when the dollar is coined and placed before the people for use and circulation it is worth but 50 cents in amount.

Now, at no time within the history of this country has such an effort been attempted with the hope that it could successfully be attained through the legislation of the two Houses of Congress. It is true that the assertion has been made from time to time that silver coinage should proceed upon this basis and upon this basis alone; but it has failed to secure the approval or the approbation of the people. I am satisfied, for my own part, that an American policy would be just and judicious in reference to the coinage of silver; that so much of it should be coined as will meet the requirements of the business and commercial operations of the people of the country; but that is not what the silver advocates desire. They do not desire the coinage of a proportionate or fixed amount of silver that may be adapted to the wants and the requirements of the business interests of the country; but they require that every possible amount that can be placed in the Treasury of the United States shall be coined into silver dollars upon this exceptional ratio.

Now, suppose this bill shall be passed and this result shall be attained by means of its operation. Then every silver dollar that may be produced from silver in this country or brought here from a foreign country may be taken to the Treasury of the United States and there coined for the benefit of the owner of the bullion. Where will this bring us? What effect will it have on the business interests of the country? It necessarily will not meet the requirements of that business; but by adding so large an amount to the silver coinage of the country it must necessarily inflate the currency and produce a speculative condition, instead of a firm, stable advancement of business. It is inevitable that this should be the result. So that there is danger that lurks in the path, even if this silver coin could be made acceptable to the people and they would take it out and use it among themselves.

But the bill does not contemplate, as the act of 1878 did not contemplate, that the amount of silver coinage shall go into circulation and be used in the business of the country. On the contrary, it is provided in this bill that whatever silver may be coined under the extensive authority of this bill may be taken to the Treasury in sums of not less than $10, and the amount shall be evidenced by the fact of a silver certificate issued to the person who deposits the silver. Now, what will be the result in case this bill should become a law in this respect? Will it be to even send the silver among the people of the silver States for use and circulation, or will it be to deposit it and pile it up in the Treasury of the United States? We can better determine what the result must necessarily be by looking back and seeing what did occur under a similar provision of the law which was enacted in 1878.

At that time it was provided that the Treasury should buy not less than 2,000,000 ounces of silver every month, and should coin not less than that amount into silver dollars, and that those silver dollars, together with the preceding silver dollars coined by the Government, should be a legal tender for the payment of debts between individuals unless it was otherwise stipulated in the contract.

It would be expected, where provision was made by these generous means for the coinage of silver if the people were willing to support this system of coinage, that when the money was created, when the silver was coined, that they would be willing to take it out of the Treasury and use it in their business and employ it in the operations of their domestic affairs. How has the fact turned out to be? Why, under the provisions of the law of 1878, instead of taking out and using silver in the business operations of the country, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the 1st of February, 1896, in this respect similar in its character to earlier reports from time to time made by the Secretary of the Treasury, shows that the coined silver has remained in the Treasury. Has it gone into circulation? Have the people desired it? Have they obtained it and used it? By no means, but the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that there is now in the Treasury, of standard silver dollars, the sum of $366,659,953 of this silver coinage.

This of itself demonstrates the fact that the people have no friendship for the coinage of the silver dollar, as this bill has provided in terms it shall be made, if it becomes a law. On the contrary, their preference is in favor of the silver certificate, although that certificate is not a legal tender and can only be used for the purpose of paying debts and obligations due to the Government. If occasion arises for the payment of a debt due to an individual, and he objects to taking the silver certificates, the party holding those certificates must go to the Treasury and get his silver dollar to be used for the purpose of making a tender. The silver certificate is of no possible use for this purpose, but it may be used for the object of obtaining from the Treasury an equivalent amount of silver dollars, which may be used in tender and satisfaction of debts between individuals.

The circumstance that silver has remained in this manner as so much dead property in the Treasury of the United States, and that these silver certificates, which are payable only in silver, are preferred to the silver dollar itself, demonstrates the inclination on the part of the people of the United States to abstain from the use of the silver dollar and to prefer in all their operations the silver certificate, although it may not be a legal tender for the payment of a debt.

Similar results followed the issuing of the Treasury notes under the act of 1890. It is true there was no provision there made for the immediate coinage of the silver bullion that should be bought by issuing these notes, and they were made payable at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, either in silver coin or gold. Yet a large amount of this silver, in fact the greater part, if not the entire amount, of the silver still remains within the Treasury of the United States. There is no disposition either to coin it or to take that coin and put it into circulation; but the people are more than satisfied with the Treasury notes, issued under these circumstances, as a substitute for the silver.

It is apparent, sir, from these facts that the people have no desire for the general coinage of silver. They certainly have no desire for the coinage of silver on the basis of 16 to 1; but if the silver is to be coined at all, that it shall be coined in such a manner as to receive their confidence and their approval by making its valuation, as nearly as may be, when coined, of the commercial value of the silver itself.

Mr. LINNEY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question for information. Is it not true that under the construction placed upon the act by the Secretary of the Treasury and the President these silver certificates are now paid in gold?

Mr. DANIELS. No, sir.

Mr. LINNEY. Does not the President speak of them as gold obligations?

Mr. DANIELS. No, sir; not the silver certificates.

Mr. LINNEY. Then it is another class of silver notes?

Mr. DANIELS. The Treasury notes. Under the construction of the Administration the Treasury notes are payable in gold or silver. Those are the notes that were issued under the act of 1890, but the silver certificates issued under the act of 1878 are payable only in silver coin.

Mr. LINNEY. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. DANIELS. That is the situation, and that is the difference between them.

Mr. COX. Suppose you take these silver certificates which you are talking about, based upon the purchase of bullion under the act of 1890, and carry them to the Secretary of the Treasury and demand gold upon those certificates, what ought he to do?

Mr. DANIELS. Well, the Secretary of the Treasury has concluded, under the authority of the Administration, that he must pay those Treasury notes in gold; but he never has concluded and never has been required to pay the silver certificates in coin of that description.

Mr. COX. The Treasurer has paid a considerable amount of those certificates in gold.

Mr. DANIELS. Silver certificates?

Mr. COX. Yes, silver certificates. He has paid them in gold.

Mr. DANIELS. I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. COX. No, I am not in error.

Mr. DANIELS. The gentleman may be right on the subject, but my recollection is otherwise.

Mr. COX. But if he declines to pay the silver certificates in gold, while paying the greenbacks in gold—if he does that, has he not destroyed the parity between the two kinds of paper money?

Mr. DANIELS. Well, that will depend upon the manner in which the paper continues to circulate between individuals in the transaction of their business. They have usually accepted these certificates as the fair equivalent of the silver dollar, which is a legal tender for the payment of debts, and in that manner the silver certificates have been kept and maintained in circulation. Now, it has been the claim of the advocates for the issuing of silver coin of this description that they are following out the theory and the laws of the early period of our Government.

Mr. Speaker, when this Government was formed the men concerned in its formation had passed through a sea of tribulations arising out of the depreciated and worthless money that had been issued by the Government of the Confederation, and they were disposed—indeed, that was one of the objects of the formation of the Federal Government—to put an end finally and forever to the issuing of paper of this description, so that when the consideration of Congress and of the Treasury Department was directed to this subject it was determined to issue gold and silver coins upon substantially the basis of 16 to 1. But at that time gold and silver bore such a relation to each other that that was their intrinsic commercial value, and it was not intended, nor was it advocated by any person at that time, that depreciated silver should be put in circulation, silver coin bearing a deficient relation to the actual value of the metal.

The purpose, then, was to place the coinage of the two metals upon substantially the same relative footing, to coin gold of the quality and description defined and provided for in the act, and to coin silver on the basis of 15 or 16 to 1, because that was the fair commercial relation that those two metals bore to each other, they being the metals most useful and best adapted for the purpose of creating a circulating medium. That relation, however, was established not because the fathers were wedded in any respect to or had any special preference for the ratio of 16 to 1, as is the case with the silver advocates of the present day, but it was because the ratio then established expressed the existing commercial relation between the value of the two metals.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Will the gentleman kindly explain what made that particular relation as to value between the two metals in 1792, when it was determined to establish a ratio of 15 to 1?

Mr. DANIELS. It was the commercial value that each metal held in the market, the metals bearing that relation one to the other, and it was for the purpose of maintaining that commercial relation in the coinage that that ratio was established.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. If the gentleman will excuse me, I fear he did not quite understand my question. The question was: What was it that produced that relation between the two metals at that time?

Mr. DANIELS. The probable production of the two metals themselves, by which they sustained in the market substantially that relation to each other. At least that was the relation accepted by the Government of the United States in providing for the system of coinage, and it continued after that down to 1878, without substantial variation, silver bearing substantially the same relation to the gold bullion of the United States that was established in the early history of the Government. It is true that changes did take place, but they were of an insignificant character; they simply related to a small percentage upon which the coins were attempted to be equalized.

Silver became more valuable than gold in the market as a coin metal, and consequently it went out of the country, and it became necessary either to reduce the quantity of silver in the dollar or to increase the quantity of gold in the gold dollar in order to keep silver in the country. The effort of the Government has been from time to time, under all circumstances, to maintain this fixed relation as far as possible between the two kinds of coin, and to see how successful they have been in this respect we need only go back to the history of our currency and note the attention and the caution that have been exercised and that have found their way into the laws of the United States, securing this result of a stable and uniform currency for the people of the United States. It is to the credit of the Government of the United States that no effort has ever been made to impose upon them a spurious or depreciated currency by the Federal Government.

A different result has arisen in some measure, at times, from the very liberal legislation of the different States providing for their banking systems, under which bills were issued without adequate security, and the people from time to time became involved in tremendous losses; but from the Government of the United States no such source of peril has ever emanated. On the contrary, the effort has always been to provide the people with intrinsically as fair, as stable, and as honest a currency as was possible under the existing circumstances. The Government has always exercised the greatest wisdom and the greatest care in this respect. It was not until the civil war that any departure was made from the established course of procedure, and even then it was not for the purpose of giving the country a depreciated currency, but for the purpose of issuing a paper currency to meet the special exigencies of the situation, with the promise, with the determination, with the provision made by law, that in the end that paper should be redeemed in gold or silver coin.

The faith of the Government was pledged to the maintenance of that system and to the redemption of that paper, and while the paper did depreciate because of the fact that so large an amount of it was necessarily issued in order to carry on the functions and meet the obligations of the Government, people never lost sight of the fact that this paper was secured; that it had behind it not only the property but the good faith of the people of the United States. Under these circumstances, while the money ran down in its actual value, there never was a doubt on the part of the patriotic people of this country that the time would arrive when the war would cease and this money would be redeemed in the substantial coin of the country similar to that which had characterized its history from the formation of the Government down to the time when the war began. And their faith has been justified by the occurrences which have since taken place. The act of 1876 provided a redemption fund for this paper, by which it has been brought up to such a standard of value that it is recognized as a safe, stable, and perfectly reliable currency, not only in this country but in European countries, wherever this money may by chance be taken.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. DANIELS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TERRY. I understood the gentleman to say, in response to the inquiry of my friend on the right, that the reason the commercial ratio of the two metals was about 16 to 1 in the early days of the Republic was the relative production of the two metals.

Mr. DANIELS. No; the substantial, the commercial value of the two.

Mr. TERRY. But the gentleman stated in reply to the inquiry of my friend on the right that the commercial ratio was about 16 to 1 on account of the relative production.

Mr. DANIELS. I said nothing about relative production; but that probably contributed very much to the establishment and maintenance of this system of value.

Mr. TERRY. Is it not true that from 1801 to 1840 the output of silver and gold was more than 71 of silver to 28 of gold, and that the present comparative output is about 20 of silver to 15 of gold?

Mr. DANIELS. I presume the gentleman is correct in his statement as to the relation that one metal bore to the other. But the relative production of the metals was, until recently, of such a character as not to excite any possible fear, because of their equal and unlimited coinage and their ability to maintain, in the judgment of the people, the valuation that was given them by the impressions put upon them at the mint.

Mr. TERRY. But the point is this: That at a time when we were getting a much greater silver output relatively to gold than we are now silver was worth more than it is now, and that hence the widening in the difference of the commercial ratio is not due to an increased output of silver.

Mr. DANIELS. Because the growth of the country required the use of this additional amount of coin, the gold production was unequal to the demands and requirements of business, and it was supplemented by the production of silver. But what have we before us now? Have we any such expectations, in view of the present situation and of the future which may be expected soon to dawn upon us if a bill of this character is to become a law? Instead of having simply so much silver coin as would be required by the people for the transaction of their business, the currency would be inflated by free silver coin, and speculative tendencies would be developed in business occupations and pursuits to the detriment of business interests, followed finally by the insolvency of a large portion of the people of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman, but I am anxious to learn. I spring "from the alkali," as the New York World puts it, and I want to get some new ideas, if possible. The gentleman says that he is in favor of a stable basis to our currency. I should like to ask him what he means by that?

Mr. DANIELS. Such a well-supported currency as will be safe, adequate, or commensurate to the transaction of the business of the country. That is what the Government is really under obligation to provide—a perfectly safe currency adequate to the business transactions of the people of the country.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I do not think the gentleman understood me. My question is, What is a stable basis for our currency? Is it one that does not change? Is it one which, relatively to the price of all other products of human toil, becomes less in value, or is it one that constantly increases in value when measured in all the other products of human toil?

Mr. DANIELS. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that every form of currency which may be devised will change more or less under different circumstances. But what I mean by a stable currency is a currency thoroughly well sustained in its real value, intrinsically equal to its coined or face value, capable of being safely used in the system of business exchanges in the operations of human affairs. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has expired, and the gentleman from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the large attendance upon this House and in the galleries convinces me that the people still love the Constitution and their country. In my opinion the burning issues which now confront the American people are more portentous in their ultimate effects upon the people of this nation and of the world than has at any time in the past demanded their attention; and these questions must be settled for weal or for woe by the sovereign electors of this nation at the ballot box, or else we must go on in the struggle for the rights of the masses against the encroachments of organized wealth and corporate greed until the conflict grows so sharp that we will find our country in the midst of a ceaseless conflict, and the institutions we so much love go down in the struggle.

Viewed from a financial standpoint, there are two distinctive forms of government, or, in other words, two distinctive financial systems and each formed to suit its peculiar kind of government.

The one system is suited to all forms of government where the industrial masses or the plain laboring people have no voice in governmental affairs, where the people do not rule, but are ruled by a king or monarch, or by an unsympathetic and arrogant aristocracy.

The other is suited to a government where the people are the masters; where no ruler is known except the law; where every man has an equal show in the eventful race of life.

The one system consists in bimetallism—gold and silver money and paper convertible into gold and silver on demand, coined and issued by the Government for the benefit of all the people, and in sufficient quantities to meet the demands of trade and commerce, and thereby to so energize business as to furnish employment to all our laboring people at reasonable wages and to afford them opportunities to become independent, home-owning, liberty-loving, patriotic citizens, surrounded by the comforts of life and blessed by all the incentives and hopes that animate the human heart, inspiring them to build up and maintain a Government for the common good of all the people.

The other system, and the one we oppose and shall continue to oppose as long as we have a voice in the councils of the nation, and the one that should receive the antagonism of all patriotic Americans, may be designated as "gold monometallism" or the "British gold standard."

It seeks to make gold the sole and only unit of value, to make gold the only money of final payment, and to give to banking corporations the sole authority to issue nonlegal-tender notes to be used by the people as a circulating medium for the transaction of the business of the country. Under this system, when fully matured, bank notes would occupy the whole field of circulation, except such amounts of nonlegal-tender subsidiary silver coins as may be used for small change.

Then what little gold we have would be held by the banks as a reserve and as a standard of value. This would, as every honest man who is disinterested must confess, place the currency of the country in the hands of corporations and speculators. In other words, it would turn over to these unpatriotic and heartless institutions the power to issue and control the whole volume of the currency, and place our trade and commerce, our people and our Government, in the hands and under the control of these moneyed corporations that have no sympathy with the toiling millions. They are without patriotism, with no God but gold, and no destiny but to enrich themselves without regard for the sufferings of the people.

When fully enthroned in power they would be as exacting and cruel toward the plain masses of our people as the most brutal tyrant that ever bathed his robes in human blood. They love the government best that gives them most. They extol the leader who, under the euphonious names of "Sound Money," "Safe Currency," and "Honest Dollar," point to them as the gods of finance and the saviors of the people, and spurn the patriotic intelligence of the sons of toil as unworthy to be considered or consulted upon these grave governmental and constitutional questions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are three crowning evils of the British gold standard about which I desire to speak.

I might properly designate them as the three black-winged angels of death, commissioned by the enemies of free government to go into the world and rule kingdoms, destroy republics, and enslave the people.

First. It destroys our foreign commerce and drives gold from us.

Second. It builds up Asiatic competition that will destroy our factories.

Third. It must end in a bonded indebtedness that will place the chains of slavery upon innocent and unborn generations.

These three propositions, Mr. Chairman, I will discuss in their order.

THE GOLD OUTFLOW AND HOW TO PREVENT IT.

Those who are willing to content themselves with the mere superficial view of our financial condition charge our present pitiable and defenseless situation to the greenbacks and Treasury notes.

The retirement of the Government notes will not have the slightest effect in stopping the export of gold. It might, to some extent, relieve the Treasury, but would cripple, rather than relieve, the country. This gold is demanded to settle our balances of trade, and whether supplied from the vaults of the Government or drawn from the channels of trade, it would nevertheless be lost to our Government.

The advocates of the British gold standard will tell you that our silver and silver certificates are kept at par only because they are indirectly redeemable in gold. If that be true these moneys could likewise be made the instruments to raid the Treasury, and the logic of their arguments would therefore also require the destruction and retirement of not only the silver certificates, but also the silver dollar, before the Treasury would receive the desired protection against the necessary consequences of the heresy of redeeming only in gold.

But those of our countrymen who seek a solution of these troubles must look beyond these mere shadows to find the remedy. As long as we pay out to foreign countries more than we receive, so long will our condition grow more agitated and embarrassing.

The foreign debt of our Government and people now exceeds $5,000,000,000. The interest charge we would have to pay upon this, at the low rate of 4 per cent, would be an annual tax upon our gold supply of $200,000,000 annually. Add to this freights paid to foreign shipowners and the expenses of Americans traveling abroad, and the sum total of our annual foreign payments is simply appalling. And this balance is rapidly increasing from year to year.

The following carefully prepared tables and estimates, made from the most authentic sources, will give the account of the United States with foreign countries for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895. This startling picture should be carefully studied by every prudent man before he takes his stand along with the gold-standard advocates:

ACCOUNT AGAINST THE UNITED STATES, 1895.

Interest, at 4 per cent, on $5,000,000,000		$200,000,000
Freight paid foreign shipowners for carriage of 84.5 per cent of our imports, or $590,000,000 out of a total of $699,000,000, allowing a charge for transportation equal to 8 per cent of the value of the produce imported	$47,200,000
Less freights paid American shipowners for carriage of 8.2 per cent of our exports, or $62,000,000 out of $758,000,000, allowing charges for freight equal to 12 per cent of the produce exported	7,440,000
Balance due foreign shipowners on ocean carriage		39,760,000
Expenditures of Americans traveling or living abroad		75,000,000
Total account against the United States		314,760,000

ACCOUNT IN FAVOR OF THE UNITED STATES.

Domestic exports		$793,392,599
Foreign exports		14,145,566
Total exports		807,538,165
Less total imports		731,969,965
Merchandise balance in favor of the United States		75,568,200
Net gold exports		31,984,449
Net exports of silver coin and bullion	$37,674,797
Less imports of silver ore not included for 1895 in the general statement of merchandise exports and imports as prior to 1894	10,636,896
		27,037,901
Total account in favor of the United States		134,590,550
Balance due and unpaid		180,169,450

Thus for the last fiscal year we added $180,000,000 to our debt and on this additional debt interest must be paid in 1896. So next year the interest charge will be something like $207,000,000 instead of $200,000,000. In this way our debt grows and must continue to grow under the policy of gold monometallism that depresses the prices of our exports.

Not until we return to true bimetallism, the unlimited use of gold and silver, and advance the price of our wheat and cotton and other exports, can we hope to escape these humiliating conditions. The gold standard, which depresses our prices, especially of the commodities, wheat and cotton, which constitute the great bulk of our exports, costs us more than $600,000,000 annually, which is plainly shown by a comparison of our prices now, under the gold standard, with the prices we received in 1873, under the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver.

The figures given in the following table for the year ending June 30, 1895, are not mere estimates, but the result of actual calculations of the comparative prices of the 16 commodities representing over two-thirds of our exports and 26 articles representing nearly one-half of our imports.

A comparison of the prices of these commodities in 1873 and in 1895 gives the following disastrous results.

At 1873 prices our trade balance for the year 1895 would have been as follows:

1895.

At prices equivalent to those received in 1873 our exports of domestic produce amounting to $793,392,599 would have been worth		$1,746,788,683
Reexports amounting to $14,145,566 would have been worth		22,272,901
Our gross exports which were valued at $807,538,165 would have brought		1,769,061,584
The same quantity of imports which were imported at a valuation of $731,969,965 would have cost, at prices equivalent to those paid in 1873		1,152,523,308
Leaving a total balance in our favor of		616,538,276
Add net gold exports		31,984,449
Add net silver exports of coin and bullion	$37,674,797
Less imports of silver ore	10,636,896
		27,037,901
Making the total balance that the same amount of effort that we expended in our foreign trade in 1895 would have put to our credit in 1873		675,560,626
Balance actually due on foreign trade for 1895		134,590,550
Loss to our foreign trade for 1895 directly due to the fall in prices caused by the demonetization of silver in 1873		540,970,076

Thus if we had received 1873 prices for our exports, and paid 1873 prices for our imports, the amount of effort that we expended in 1895 in our foreign trade would have resulted in a net balance in our favor of $675,560,626.

We could have paid our interest charge of $200,000,000 and had the sum of $475,560,626 due us, which would of necessity have caused this sum of money to be paid to our people, and instead of gold being exported it would be flowing into the vaults of our Government and into the pockets of our people. [Applause.]

But England, the great consumer of our exports, does not want a rise in prices. We owe her. We sell and she buys. And the lower the prices go the more produce it takes to pay our debts.

Mr. Giffen, one of the ablest writers on political economy, says:

A creditor nation is able to draw more from its tributaries who have to pay in the appreciating money than it would otherwise be able to draw. To pay the same debt they must send to their creditors 30, 50, perhaps 100 per cent more of produce than they would otherwise have to send. There is no doubt that in this sense the weight of a gold debt of a debtor country like India or the United States has enormously increased of late years.

Gold monometallists in England want low prices. Bimetallists in the United States want an advance in prices.

As an evidence of what England wants I submit the following paragraph from the London Times:

It seems impossible to have bimetallists understand that there is quite a large number of us for whom a general rise in prices has no charms whatever. We like them low, and the lower the better. If they all went down to half their present figures we should rejoice, because we have nothing to sell and many things to buy. For those who have things to sell we do not feel any great concern.

This explains their position, but why an American gold bug should advocate this British policy, if disinterested, no man can divine.

Gold monometallism has brought us to this humiliating condition, and in order to maintain it the President has been compelled to issue bonds and saddle a burdensome debt upon the people.

Our foreign creditors have become the dictators of our policy. They take our gold and compel us to issue bonds. And the gold monometallist all over the country applaud the President's courage because he so kindly submits to British dictation.

How long shall this continue? Let the unbought millions decide.

If our foreign debts are permitted to go on increasing, as they must and will under the gold standard, prices must continue to fall, and as prices continue to fall we are called upon to export a greater and greater quantity of produce. More bushels of wheat and corn and more bales of cotton must be sold to meet our foreign obligations.

You may retire the greenbacks and Treasury notes, and still the grinding process will go on and continue until it ends in the abject slavery of the producing classes. And this, too, at no distant day, for our property is rapidly passing into foreign hands, and our Government seems submissive to the dictates of foreign creditors.

There is but one way to avert these calamities: Stop the depreciation of things we sell to pay our debts. Abandon the gold standard. Return to the free coinage of gold and silver. Pay in the money of the Constitution and of the contract. We can then preserve our commercial independence and escape dependence upon foreign money lenders, the degradation of our Government, and the slavery of our people. [Applause.]

ASIATIC COMPETITION.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another evil growing out of the gold standard, more destructive to our industries and far more disastrous to the great army of our honest and patient working people than the proposition just presented. There are to-day more than 1,000,000,000 people whose governments are upon the silver basis and who have not felt the shock and paralysis of falling prices which has well-nigh prostrated our single gold standard countries.

I have never seen any fact nor read any statement from any disinterested economist that refutes or denies that prices in all silver-using countries have remained stable and substantially the same since the demonetization of silver in 1873; and all admit that since the fall in the value of silver or the rise in the value of gold, whichever you may choose to call it, every country on earth having the single gold standard has been swept with panics, and universal loss and depreciation in prices have brought want and gloom to the masses all over the land.

That these conditions have existed in this country since the demonetization of silver is within the personal knowledge of every man who has lived during that period. Every piece of property stands sponsor for the declaration and every farm in the great agricultural South and West is a mute but living witness of the truth of this declaration.

The sworn records from all the States of the Union show that in the year 1894 there was a falling off in the valuation of property, as compared with the previous year, in all the States lying between Pennsylvania and the Pacific Ocean on the west, and the Gulf of Mexico on the south, of the astonishing sum of $412,510,985; and every farmer living in this broad and fertile region has felt the crushing grasp of this cruel monster—the British gold standard.

Let Mr. Giffen, the head of gold monometallism in England, answer. In his essay on the changes of prices and incomes in 1888, he says:

The fall in prices in such a general way as to amount to what is known as a rise in the purchasing power of gold is generally—I might say, universally—admitted.

And he further said:

All the evidence points to a continuance of this appreciation.

And in speaking of the effects of the situation he frankly said:

Debtors pay more than they would otherwise pay and creditors receive more, and this appreciation is a serious matter to those who have debts to pay.

Mr. Goshen, for many years Mr. Gladstone's chancellor of the exchequer, and also Professor Jevons declare the same truth, and fully concur with Mr. Giffen.

These three leading gold-standard advocates, not only of England but of the world, frankly admit that gold has largely increased in its purchasing power, and that consequently prices generally have greatly fallen. And yet the new converts to English faith in this country deny it, but whether their denials are unselfish and wholly patriotic I can not say.

But in silver-standard countries the situation is just the reverse. Their standard when measured by their own products has remained stable. There has been no preceptible change in the general level of prices in their country. They have not been subjected to the disastrous effects of constantly falling prices. They have been free from financial panics. Their people have been as prosperous and happy as at any previous time in their history. The ounce of silver will, in their country, pay for as much labor, buy as much of the necessities of life, and pay as much of debt as it ever would, but when compared with gold, then the appreciation of gold and the disparity between gold and silver appears.

The result of this condition is that if a Japanese manufacturer makes a plow or other articles at a cost to him in Japan of $10 and exports it to the United States and sells it for $10, valued under the gold standard, his plow will have brought him in his home money about $20. So that the premium on gold, amounting to about 50 per cent, operates as a bonus to him of 50 per cent, represented by this premium on gold.

And upon examination we find that this condition has inspired the manufacturing interests of Japan and China to such an extent that it actually threatens our factories, not only with hurtful competition, but with actual destruction. There are to-day, in actual operation in Japan, 57 cotton mills, with 834,000 spindles. And the additional factories that are being rapidly constructed gives promise that in the near future there will be 700,000 more spindles going.

During last year England sold to Japan and China machinery amounting to $50,000,000, which shows the wonderful progress of manufactures in those countries.

The following interview appeared in the Philadelphia Item, December 14, 1895, with the Japanese consul-general at New York, which shows clearly the growing danger:

WHAT NONFREE SILVER IS DOING.

[The Item, Philadelphia, Pa., December 14, 1895.]

The Japanese consul-general of New York says that he thinks Japan is on the eve of building up a large trade of Japanese products in the United States. He says Japan has an ample supply of low-cost coal, and is buying and making the best machinery for a large export trade.

He adds that hemp and cotton carpets, wall paper, copper and bronze ware, crystal ware, silk handkerchiefs, raw silk, pongee, umbrellas, rags, beer, tobacco, coal, and matches are among the leaders.

Besides these, Japanese agents are now offering bicycles at $12.50, sashes, doors, and blinds, and wool carpets at astonishingly low prices; in fact, no line is now drawn limiting what that country proposes to do in selling to the United States as well as to all gold-basis countries so long as silver continues depreciated.

Take the above bicycle as an example for all the other goods. It is claimed equal to the best in this country, and at the price mentioned is delivered duty and freight free in San Francisco.

The $12.50 received for each bicycle is in gold. This is sold for silver, equaling $20 to the Japanese manufacturer. He pays fifteen of his silver dollars for making, freight, duties, etc., and clears a net profit of $5 in silver.

This same method of profit is available to the Japanese for everything they are able to produce, as well as selling coal in the San Francisco market.

The consul-general says that coal would be so sold now if the ships had a return cargo.

The following statement made by William M. Bunker, editor of the Stock Report, a reputable journal of San Francisco, in answer to an inquiry made by the Hon. WILLIAM M. STEWART, shows more in detail the character of this competition:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., November 30, 1895.

Hon. WILLIAM M. STEWART, Washington, D. C.:

The Daily Report of November 23 gave details of a Japanese invasion of the American markets. Articles of Japanese manufacture since the close of their war are being received of equal quality with American manufactured goods, and at prices so low that our manufactories of these articles must close unless relieved by Congressional action. Report stated that H. E. Reynell, of Kobe, Japan, established an agency in San Francisco, in the Crocker Building, Mr. Edward O. Burns being their agent, for the sale of Japanese manufactured goods for the purpose of underselling American products. Similar agencies are being established East and West now by representatives of Japanese houses. The agency here is now selling the best parlor matches in tin-lined box, in box and case lots of 50 gross in a case, delivered to the merchant freight and duty paid, at 30 cents per gross. He also sells doors, sashes, blinds, and all articles of woodenware, cooperage, stock, etc., of Japanese manufacture at from 30 to 50 per cent less than they can be manufactured for in this country, with all freight and duty paid by the Japanese importers; also clocks, watches, bicycles, boots, shoes, clothing, hats, caps, gloves, fancy goods, and notions on similar terms. Their agents are buying cotton-mill machinery and shipping to Japan and will take our cotton from here to Japan and send it back manufactured for less than it can possibly be manufactured in this country. They also take cargoes of Pacific Coast lumber, manufacture the same in Japan into woodenware, etc., and return same here manufactured at 50 per cent less than our manufacturers' wholesale prices.

A meeting has been called in San Francisco for the Chamber of Commerce, Board of Trade, and Manufacturers' Association to memorialize Congress for relief. The appraiser of the port of San Francisco, in an interview with the editor of the Report, speaks of largely increased importations of Japanese goods of all kinds. He also notes a change in silk goods. They were formerly all white, but are now colored to beat the coloring of France or America.

WM. M. BUNKER,
Editor Daily Report.

This difference in the value of gold and silver caused by the exclusion of silver from the mints represents the difference of exchange between gold-standard and and silver-standard countries, which is about 50 per cent.

The producers of wheat and cotton first felt the injurious effects of this Asiatic competition and this divergence in exchange. For a hundred years an ounce of silver in the Asiatic countries has represented the value of a bushel of wheat, with very little fluctuation. Although this may appear phenomenal, the fact stands established beyond any question, and remains true to-day.

The Asiatic exports his wheat to Liverpool, which brings him there an ounce of silver, as it did before the demonetization of silver. He coins this silver at home into from $1.30 to $1.37, according to the ratio established in the particular country.

While our mints were open to the free coinage of silver our people could ship their wheat to Liverpool and receive an ounce of silver for each bushel of wheat and return home and have it coined into $1.29 of silver money; but since the closing of our mints he can not do this.

The Asiatic can have his silver coined into money. The American can not, but must suffer the difference in exchange; and while his competitor realizes $1.30 a bushel for his wheat the American realizes about one-half, or 60 cents, for his wheat when measured by the gold standard.

The same is true of cotton or any other commodity that must meet this competition in the foreign markets.

Before the demonetization of silver our proximity to the markets, our fertile lands, improved means of production, and the activity and skill of our people made us masters of the open markets; but not so now. These conditions, operating as they do to give their competitors a premium or bonus over the fruits of our farms, is building them up and pulling us down. Their countries are a scene of progress and enlarging agriculture. On every hand the cry is to enlarge the farms. Plant more wheat and more cotton. Let the forests give way to our rising civilization, our growing agriculture, and our expanding commerce; but with us it is different, sadly so. Amid the rich harvest fields of the South and West the cry is overproduction. Plant less wheat and less cotton. Reduce your acreage, and let your labor stand idle and beg employment in the face of your wasting fields.

This advice can be heard from farmer, pulpit stand, and press. While our much inferior neighbors are fast taking the markets of the world, while we are fighting at shadows, while our modern patriots are discussing the parity of the metals, the ratio, the 50-cent dollar, etc., the Mongolian races are winning victories over our commerce and over our factories that should alarm every patriot for the safety of our nation.

These appalling conditions, Mr. Speaker, must be met; met promptly, patriotically, and with courage, or the great Anglo-Saxon race must go down in the conflict, and our boasted Republic, the hope of the world, but the victim of British greed and hate, must melt before the rising Oriental sun.

For many years the pauper labor of Europe has alarmed our laboring people, but here are 1,000,000,000 people whose competition, under the gold standard, will close our factories, reduce our laboring people to pauperism and want, and utterly annihilate our agriculture, and drive our commerce from all the seas.

In the presence of these dangers, and surrounded by these conditions we should demand the restoration of silver and reestablish the parity of exchange between the nations of the world; rehabilitate our factories and farms; reestablish the conditions of universal prosperty. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, if I could to-day with mathematical certainty make known to this House and the country what twenty-three years of the gold standard has cost the people of this nation there would not be an advocate of that cruel system in this Capitol or at the other end of the avenue but whose knees would knock together like Belshazzar's when the hand appeared upon that frightful night and wrote upon the wall:

Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin. Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting.

Sir, the broken fortunes, the wrecked homes, the crushed hopes, the shrieks of woe, the suicides, the army of tramps thrown upon the world by its cruel decree, make a picture that would appall the stoutest heart and make the vilest miscreant of earth hide his face in shame.

But, Mr. Speaker, we need not dwell in conjecture or mere speculation. We have only to look at the operations of our Treasury under the rules and practices inaugurated by the Republican predecessors of Mr. Carlisle, which he has so blindly followed, in open defiance to the doctrines of the Democratic party.

By the written law of the land the greenbacks and Sherman notes are made redeemable in coin; but our distinguished Secretary prefers to travel the unlawful paths of his Republican predecessors, rather than give the gold gamblers and speculators an honest Democratic rebuke.

This same scheme of raiding the Treasury was attempted in Mr. Cleveland's first Administration, when Daniel Manning was Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Manning went to New York and called the gold raiders together and gave them this plain Democratic talk:

GENTLEMEN: The Treasury is willing to furnish gold for any legitimate demand, but if you attempt to draw upon the Treasury gold after to-day as you are now doing, for hoarding or speculation, I shall adopt an effective remedy for the protection of the Government's reserve. We have a cash balance of over $150,000,000. Not one of you doubts for a moment the ability and purpose of the Government to maintain specie payment. But if you continue to withdraw gold I shall at once order that you be paid 10 per cent in silver coin the first day, the second day you will be paid 20 per cent in silver, and the third day 30 per cent, and so on until one-half is paid you in silver.

"But," exclaimed the astonished bankers, "this is in violation of the implied obligation that the Government will pay in gold."

"Make no mistake about that, gentlemen," replied Mr. Manning, "the law says 'coin,' and the Treasury will exercise its undoubted prerogative."

That ended the gold raiding. The Government won the victory just as soon as its Secretary showed that he had backbone. And it could win the same victory to-day. Manning's way was Jackson's way. Jackson said: "I take the responsibility," and ordered the removal of the deposits from the United States Bank, telling the banking ring that if they wanted a panic they were at liberty to proceed.

If President Cleveland would only suggest to Mr. Carlisle the propriety of administering to these mercenaries a dose of Manning's medicine, the Government would be saved from the humiliating process of the "endless chain." When statesmen took hold of one end of the chain, the thieves would release the other, and the credit, as well as the dignity of the Goverment, would be maintained.

The Treasury is amply able to take this course. We have to-day more than $50,000,000 in silver bullion in the Treasury which belongs to the Government; and we have, in addition to that, a cash balance of more than $170,000,000.

But rather than take this course, Mr. Carlisle chooses to continue to issue bonds for more gold, and parade the country, making speeches in defense of his Republican practices, trying to convince the commercial world that our money is not good, and that the public credit is in danger. If Mr. Carlisle was a merchant, and should make such speeches about his own business, he would be closed by attachment in ten minutes.

This course is sought to be justified upon the ground that it is necessary to maintain the parity. They seek to maintain silver by refusing to extend to it the same privileges that gold enjoys as redemption money. They hold one up and strike the other down. They claim to be the friend of silver, and with remorseless hand plunge the dagger into its heart; and notwithstanding all this, the irredeemable silver dollar stands to-day at par, not by reason of this treatment, but in spite of it.

Dr. Sagrado said of his patient:

I poured hot water down his throat till he could paddle in it, and I bled him till there was not a drop of blood in his body, and yet he came devilish near dying.

We have many political Sagrados in this country of ours who use the same high degree of scientific learning in the treatment of our finance.

We are a great, recuperative, and strong people, able to regain strength almost as fast as we are bled; but it would make glad every honest heart to see how the very desert places would bloom and blossom beneath the righteous sun of a beneficent Government that would maintain honest bimetallism in the interest of all our people. [Continued applause.]

The defenseless efforts being made to maintain the single gold standard in the very teeth of our statutes and in open violation of the plainest principles of our Government has, during the present Administration, already cost us $262,000,000 in interest-bearing bonds, and the burden has only begun.

In order to perpetuate and maintain the gold standard, the greenbacks, amounting to $346,000,000, and the Sherman certificates or Treasury notes, amounting to $154,000,000, must also be redeemed and canceled, and $500,000,000 more of interest-bearing bonds issued to accomplish that purpose, giving us in bonds $762,000,000. And when these bonds shall have gone into the hands of the national banks the same war will be inaugurated against the silver dollar and silver certificates that is now being waged against the greenbacks and Sherman notes, and they, too, will be retired in order to protect the gold reserve, which will necessitate the issuance of $340,000,000 more bonds. This will give us a bonded indebtedness of $1,102,000,000, which will cost us, interest at 3 per cent, $33,060,000 annually.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the cost the people must pay for the destruction of their own money. The place now occupied by this money will be filled by national-bank notes. The banks will furnish the people their money at 10 per cent interest, if they can put up the collateral.

Let me recapitulate, and show what this change of our fiscal system will cost us in thirty years:

Bonds already issued	$262,000,000
Bonds to retire greenbacks and Sherman notes	500,000,000
Bonds for retirement of silver dollars, etc	340,000,000
	1,102,000,000
Interest for thirty years at 3 per cent	991,800,000
	2,093,800,000
Say the people borrow of banks (low estimate)	500,000,000
Interest for thirty years at, say, 5 per cent	750,000,000
Grand total	3,343,800,000

This is $300,000,000 more than the civil war cost the United States. It is five times as much as all the gold in the United States. It is almost three times as much as all the money of all kinds in the United States. It is nearly as much as all the gold in the inhabited world.

It would be far better for us, Mr. Speaker, if every dollar in gold in the United States were cast into the bottom of the deep rather than place the chains of this bonded slavery upon the necks of our people.

Well may I repeat the words of the once great Carlisle: "The destruction of one-half of the money metal of the world would be more disastrous to the people than all the pestilences, wars, and famines that ever occurred in the history of the world."

And yet, Mr. Speaker, honorable gentlemen will stand within these walls and declare that they are the friends of silver, that they are bimetallists, and cast their votes against this bill.

They may deceive themselves, Mr. Speaker, but they can no longer deceive an honest and confiding constituency. It may be the voice of Jacob, but it is the hand of Esau.

Double dealing will no longer be tolerated by the people. The Republican party has pretended in its platforms and before the country that it was in favor of silver as one of the standard moneys of the country, but when by its vote it shall defeat this bill it will give the lie to its pretensions and stand before the country in its true light as the party that demonetized silver, established the gold standard, the mother of national banks, and, with its hands still black with these crimes, is willing, in defiance of the wishes of the people, to defeat this beneficent measure and authorize the issuance of an unlimited amount of bonds.

You are in absolute control of this House, but instead of giving relief you have decided to do nothing this session toward relieving the people. You choose to increase taxation and give an additional power to issue bonds rather than give relief.

Our people, Mr. Speaker, are a patient, patriotic people, but the point of their endurance has been reached, and you can already hear the mutterings of their discontent, and when you defeat this bill an outraged and indignant people will rescue the Government from your hands. The Democratic party, elected in 1892 by an unprecedented majority, was overwhelmed in defeat. Her standard bearer, Mr. Cleveland, turned his back upon the cardinal principles of the party and espoused the Sherman idea of finance, divided his party, disappointed the hopes of our people, and converted triumphant victory into ignominious defeat, and the same ignominious defeat awaits you in 1896. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The majority of the American people are Democrats; and while they are loyal to their party, they are also loyal to its fundamental principles. When their trusted leaders deceive them, it must be expected that they will administer just such a rebuke as the party received in 1894.

But, Mr. Speaker, this does not indicate the putrefaction or decay of the party. It only shows that the party possesses the elements to purify itself. Let the rank and file of the "unwashed" Democracy become aroused, and they will take charge of their party machinery and impress upon its candidates and platforms their patriotic convictions.

The Democratic party will live as long as constitutional government is maintained; and I believe the perpetuity of our institutions, personal liberty, home rule, just taxation, and the hopes of our industrial people depend upon the destiny of that party.

No surer means for the defeat of free coinage can be adopted than to induce a part of its number to draw away from it. Divide its forces upon the advocacy of bimetallism to warring factions under the names of new parties, and you make victory an easy task for the enemies of the money of the Constitution.

The great body of the Democratic party is for free coinage of gold and silver, and her great heart beats in sympathy with the struggling masses of the world. Let her brave and patriotic sons gather hope and courage, and as one man take charge of her conventions, nominate her candidates, write her platforms, and victory is at hand. Rescue her flag, consecrated by a thousand victories and made glorious by seventy years of government administered in the interest of all our people, from the hands of those who have defiled it, and place it in the hands of a man in touch with the cardinal principles of the party, and victory is ours.

I can hear her battle songs of liberty. I can see the long columns of her soldiers, made up from farm and shop, as they charge upon a retreating foe. I can see stock jobbers, gold gamblers, and protected plutocrats flying in utter confusion before the tramp of her invincible hosts.

We can do this; it is our duty to do it. We owe it to ourselves, our children, and our country. I urge this course upon my countrymen, believing that it is the only sure road to victory. [Renewed applause.]

The following is a copy of the bond bill as it passed the Republican House:

An act to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That in addition to the authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury by the act approved January 14, 1875, entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," he is authorized from time to time, at his discretion, to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, coupon or registered bonds of the United States, to an amount sufficient for the object stated in this section, bearing not to exceed 3 per cent interest per annum, payable semiannually, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, in coin, after five years from their date, and payable in fifteen years after their date, with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions provided in said act for the bonds therein authorized. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall use the proceeds thereof for the redemption of United States legal-tender notes, and for no other purpose: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or modify an act approved May 31, 1878, entitled "An act to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes." Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall offer any of the bonds authorized for sale by this act or by the resumption act of 1875 he shall advertise the same and authorize subscriptions therefor to be made at the Treasury Department and at the subtreasuries and designated depositories of the United States.

SEC. 2. That to provide for any temporary deficiency now existing, or which may hereafter occur, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, at his discretion, to issue certificates of indebtedness of the United States to an amount not exceeding $50,000,000, payable in three years after their date to the bearer in lawful money of the United States, of the denomination of $20, or multiples thereof, with annual coupons for interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, and to sell and dispose of the same for not less than an equal amount of lawful money of the United States at the Treasury Department and at the subtreasuries and designated depositories of the United States and at such post-offices as he may select. And such certificates shall have the like qualities, privileges, and exemptions provided in said resumption act for the bonds therein authorized. And the proceeds thereof shall be used for the purpose prescribed in this section, and for no other.

The following is a copy of the above bill as amended by the Senate:

That from and after the passage of this act the mints of the United States shall be open to the coinage of silver, and there shall be coined dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, of standard silver, nine-tenths fine, as provided by the act of January 18, 1837, and upon the same terms and subject to the limitations and provisions of law regulating the coinage and legal-tender quality of gold; and whenever the said coins herein provided for shall be received into the Treasury, certificates may be issued therefor in the manner now provided by law.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall coin into standard silver dollars, as soon as practicable, according to the provisions of section 1 of this act, from the silver bullion purchased under authority of the act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," that portion of said silver bullion which represents the seigniorage or profit to the Government, to wit, the difference between the cost of the silver purchased under said act and its coinage value, and said silver dollars so coined shall be used in the payment of the current expenses of the Government; and for the purpose of making the said seigniorage immediately available for use as money, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue silver certificates against it, as if it was already coined and in the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That no national-bank note shall be hereafter issued of a denomination less than $10, and all notes of such banks now outstanding of denominations less than that sum shall be, as rapidly as practicable, taken up, redeemed, and canceled, and notes of $10 and larger denominations shall be issued in their stead under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem the United States notes, commonly called "greenbacks," and also the Treasury notes issued under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890, when presented for redemption, in standard silver dollars or in gold coin, using for redemption of said notes either gold or silver coins, or both, not at the option of the holder but exclusively at the option of the Treasury Department, and said notes, commonly called "greenbacks," when so redeemed, shall be reissued as provided by the act of May 31, 1878.

I oppose the bill; I support the amendment of the Senate, and upon this issue I appeal to the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything upon this important question at this late hour, but as I have been recognized by the Speaker, I will submit my views upon the substitute that has been brought from the Senate to the House. I much prefer, Mr. Speaker, the substitute to the House bill. I will give my reasons for it. The tendency, in my opinion, of the management of the financial affairs in the United States is to ignore silver altogether. Coinage, according to the best definition that I have seen, is to stamp upon pieces of metal certain characteristics which give it the character of legal tender. To stamp upon metal, Mr. Speaker. That is the definition given by old Noah Webster, who is regarded as a pretty good authority not only in the United States, but throughout the world.

Now, sir, according to the present construction placed upon our coinage laws by the powers that be in the United States, this definition of coinage has been, or soon will be, changed so as to make it read: "The stamping upon gold metal such characters as give to it the force and power of a legal tender."

In my humble judgment, Mr. Speaker, that is a dangerous innovation. It reverses the meaning of language. It reverses the policy of this Republic, and will, in the end, result in still further confusion and disaster to the people of these United States. If I had it in my power I would limit the coinage of silver to the American product. I would do that, Mr. Speaker, for the reason that there does exist in these United States to-day a serious question in the minds of some of the best thinkers of the Republic as to whether the United States Government would be able to maintain at par with gold all the silver in the world—I mean by that the free and unlimited coinage of the silver of the entire world.

Still, Mr. Speaker, I prefer this to the bill that went from the House, and while I shall vote for any amendment, should there be such an amendment presented, which limits the coinage of silver to the American product, I shall vote for this substitute that came from the Senate, preferring it to the House bill. Still, my best judgment is that it is safer to limit the coinage of silver to the American product. All the American product should be coined into legal-tender coins. This is absolutely necessary to provide an adequate redemption fund. The Chief Executive of the United States has informed this Congress in his first message at this session—

That the Treasury notes issued in payment of silver purchased under the law of 1890 were necessarily treated as gold obligations, at the option of the holder. These notes on the 1st day of November, 1893, when the law compelling the monthly purchase of silver was repealed, amounted to more than $155,000,000. The notes of this description now outstanding, added to the United States notes still undiminished by redemption or cancellation, constitute a volume of gold obligations amounting to nearly $500,000,000. These obligations are the instruments which, ever since we have had a gold reserve, have been used to deplete it.

It thus appears, Mr. Speaker, that the basis upon which our financial system now rests is too narrow. Sixty-five million dollars, which is about the amount of the gold reserve, is insufficient to meet the ever-present demand of $500,000,000, which, as fast as they are paid, are at once reissued. Hence the President's remarkable utterance that—

This redemption does not redeem, and this payment is without acquittance.

This condition is like a cone on its apex. The stupendous volume of money necessary to our national prosperity must have a broader basis than $100,000,000 to rest upon. The coinage of the American product of silver into legal-tender coins will supply this great want and render wholly unnecessary any further issue of Government bonds.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the coinage of metals, so far as the United States is concerned, should be confined closely to the two great metals that have heretofore existed and which have heretofore been considered as the best representatives of money—I mean hard money, to wit, gold and silver. In the past ages of the world both gold and silver have been recognized as money. I recollect calling upon one of the ablest divines I ever knew, the Rev. Mr. Tidball, an old blue-stocking Presbyterian, who had given forty years of a noble life to the study of theology, and I asked him to collect for me, if he could, from the Holy Scriptures, and to give me from revealed truth, the various texts touching this question of silver, and that grand old servant of the Almighty presented me, I believe, with sixty-nine references, and gave me this information, that in those sixty-nine references, drawn from revealed truth, from a source that could never err, in every one of them silver was recognized as the current money of the merchants.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, I believe if you will examine the books you will find that the gold talent and the silver talent bore about the relation of 16 to 1. I believe, furthermore, that if scholars will examine the question they will find that the old shekel, the silver shekel and the gold shekel, bore about the same relation of 16 to 1, showing that according to the edict and decree of the God of the universe this ratio of 16 to 1 was established long before the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] had being.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to notice one or two of the objections that are made against the coinage of silver. It has been asserted upon this floor, and it will be asserted whenever a speech of any length is made by those who oppose silver coinage, that the friends of silver are actuated by some personal interest. I heard the argument made the other day in the Senate by grave and dignified Senators that the free coinage of silver would only result in benefiting the owners of silver ore, the owners of the lands in which silver is found, and thus inure to the benefit of a class and not of the masses. I deny that. Let us see if it can be proven. Who are the owners of the silver in the United States? You do not know to-night, Mr. Speaker, but what you own the richest mine there is in this country.

No man upon this floor, no man that ever has been upon this floor, can tell but what the very ground on which this Capitol stands is rich with an inexhaustible store of the white metal. No living mortal knows but what the immense blocks of stone out of which this great building is made will be torn down by the hand of the miner in less than fifty years from this time in search of silver. Prior to 1861 it was supposed that we had no silver in the United States. Since that time it has been ascertained that God Almighty has blessed us with more silver than all the other countries in the world possess. Prior to 1861 we had to resort to foreign silver to supply our wants, principally the Spanish milled dollar. But after 1861, and especially after the seventies, when it was ascertained that the greatest natural gift that God had blessed us with was silver, we turned our backs upon it and so, in a business sense, committed business suicide, if such an expression is admissible.

But I take the position, Mr. Speaker, that so far as anyone now can know, so far as it is possible for human intelligence to ascertain, the argument is a sound one that silver and the silver interest are more universally diffused throughout this country than the timber interest, than the water-power interest, than the stone-quarry interest, than the iron interest, than almost any interest you can speak of. Why, sir, a few years ago it was supposed that we had no silver in the Piedmont region of country where I live, but it turned out but a few months ago that an enterprising fellow-citizen from the great State of New York traveled down through that country and while passing over the mountain known as Grandfather Mountain—a great mountain that has been lying there in the shape of a grandfather on his back from the beginning of time down to the present without having been approached by anybody except, perhaps, for the purpose of herding cattle upon it—that old New Yorker, passing through the laurels there, discovered some evidences of silver, and a man went to work upon it, and to-day that is regarded by some of the best business men of our country as the finest property in the district that I have the honor to represent.

In all probability there is within that mountain, deep down, placed there by the hands of Omnipotence, a silver interest greater in value than all the rest of the property in the district. Is it not, then, a suicidal policy for the people of the United States at this time, when they are just beginning to learn that the greatest gift that has been bestowed upon them by God is silver, to turn their backs upon it, especially when, as I remarked a while ago, before the sixties, and back in the Revolutionary time, we had to resort to foreign silver, to the Spanish milled dollar, even, to save this great and glorious country of ours? And it is respectfully submitted that we can only protect this great interest by its coinage; for that was the purpose of its creation.

At this point an idea strikes me, drawn from our country's history. The first bank organized in the United States was in the State of Pennsylvania. It was without a charter. Its stock was all paid in the Spanish milled dollar. How did it happen to be organized? It was without a charter. It was organized upon a report that the Army was about to mutiny and disband because of the impossibility of getting provisions. Those grand old Pennsylvanians made a donation of 3,000,000,000 of rations and 300 hogsheads of rum for the Army. But those supplies could not be transported. So this bank was organized, and every dollar of its subscription was paid in the white metal, the Spanish milled dollar. And by these means those 3,000,000,000 of rations and 300 hogsheads of rum made their way to Washington's army, and thus in all probability that army succeeded by reason of the employment of the Spanish milled dollar in the organization of the first bank that was ever organized in these United States.

Mr. Speaker, I deny that the friends of silver or even the owners of the silver mines are reasonably or justly liable to the charge of being actuated by unpatriotic motives. Let me see about that. Suppose it were proved beyond controversy that there was not a single ounce of silver east of the Rocky Mountains, but every particle of it lay west of the Rockies. Even then it is a godsend to this country that it exists there in the abundance that it does. Why do I say that? In the first place, there is territory enough west of the Rocky Mountains for almost every citizen of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Maine, where I believe they hate silver, or rather I will say they oppose it—there is territory enough there for every one yet to become an owner of real estate and thereby obtain an opportunity to become the owner of the white metal. But suppose they did not do that. Still the existence of the metal there as a part of our national wealth, though undeveloped, opens up hundreds of thousands of avenues of hope to the young, to the active, to the poor of this country, who would otherwise find these avenues of hope closed.

Sir, let me give a practical illustration. A few years ago there was a poor fellow in my part of the country, a plowman, working, I am told, for 35 cents a day. The idea struck him that possibly he could better his condition by going out to the "woolly West" and hunt for silver. Seated upon a mule, he passed through a portion of the wilderness country in the State of Montana. By accident he discovered some silver. He went to work and realized from that enterprise a large sum of money, $50,000 I have been informed, at the start. That poor plowman came home after organizing a company; he returned to the very neighborhood where he had worked for 35 cents a day as a plowman; he purchased broad acres in the beautiful valley of the Yadkin, and he now has under his employment a large number of hands. He stimulated several other industrial enterprises in that neighborhood; and thus Montana's silver has blessed the plowmen of North Carolina. Here is an instance where an humble plowman availed himself of those great natural resources away across the Rocky Mountains and is to-day a public benefactor to the section in which he originally resided. So, Mr. Chairman, I take the position that we are all interested in this silver question, and the argument that only the owners of the discovered mines are benefited is without force.

But suppose it should turn out presently that great mines of silver should be found in the State of Maine or New York, how long would it be before those two States would make a complete somersault upon the silver question? They would not be able to change their ground quickly enough.

Mr. Speaker, I recollect reading once in an old book a comment upon logic. One of the old philosophers said, "If you will give me Aristotle's system of logic, I will force my enemy to a conclusion; give me the syllogism and that is all I ask." Another old philosopher replies, "If you will give me the Socratic system of interrogatory, I will run my adversary into a corner." Another old philosopher, standing by, said, "My brethren, if you will give me a little ready cash, I will always gain my point; I will always drive my adversary to a conclusion, because," said he, "a little ready cash is a wonderful clearer of the intellect."

So, I say, if it should turn out that silver should be found in large quantities in the East, in the State of New York, the State of Maine, the State of Massachusetts, the State of North Carolina, or South Carolina, to the same extent that it exists in Nevada, what would be the result? Why, we of the East would be just as anxious to have the white metal recognized in the legislation of the country as the gentlemen who represent the States of the Pacific Coast.

Mr. Speaker, I plead for the plowmen of the Republic. They constitute the great conservative, productive force of this Republic whose interest we can not ignore. Possibly 90 per cent of that class of our people would be benefited by the enlarged use of silver as money. It is recorded in the Wisdom of the Ancients, that in the reign of Henry VIII the question was presented to the minds of the best leaders of thought of the British Empire, "How can civil war be prevented? What remedy can be applied for that greatest national disorder, civil war?" The only remedy that then appeared satisfactory was this: Let the British Empire so govern its subjects that the greatest possible number of plowmen shall be the owners of their own plows. Let all the American products of silver be coined into legal-tender coins, and the plowmen of the land, the toiling masses, will have new lines of hope opened up to them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

And then, on motion of Mr. SIMPKINS (at 10 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a petition of the Whatcom Board of Trade, of New Whatcom, Wash., in behalf of the bill introduced by me to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses. In the course of the statements of the petition it is set forth that there are fortifications in British Columbia in the immediate vicinity of the city from which this petition proceeds. It is represented that the city of Vancouver is fortified, also the cities of Victoria and Esquimalt, British Columbia, and that though placed in such a perilous position near the frontier there is not a single fortification on the coast of the State of Washington, nor a gun or man to defend it. The petitioners represent that the interests involved are very great, many populous cities line the shores of Puget Sound, that the interests of 200,000 people and a foreign commerce, excelled only by the ports of New York and San Francisco, are at stake, and that our national interests in that region require fortifications. I shall not comment at length upon it. The petition is a very earnest one, and is well expressed. It is signed by the members of the board of trade, the city council, and numerous other citizens. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SQUIRE. I also present a petition signed by many citizens of the State of Washington, including the governor, judges on the bench, and prominent lawyers of the State, in favor of Senate bill 988, having for its object the removal of contests and litigations in the United States Land Department from that Department to courts of the United States. Among other things, it is stated that the rights of the settlers to their homesteads are often violated, owing to the inefficiency of the Land Department, in that it has no compulsory process for the attendance of witnesses, and that it is compelled under existing laws and circumstances to adjudicate the rights of contestants without the proper facilities and without the process or authority of the courts. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SQUIRE presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Tacoma, Wash., praying for the passage of Senate bills No. 1172 and No. 1242, to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States to improve the merchant marine engineer service, and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the city council of Cosmopolis, Wash., praying for the speedy construction of the Nicaragua Canal under the control of the Government; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle, Wash., praying that an appropriation of $10,000 be made for the purpose of flax fiber experiments on Puget Sound; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a petition from the city of Spokane, Wash., in which it is stated that in consequence of the near relations, commercial and otherwise, of the United States to the people of Cuba the citizens of the United States can not refrain from feeling a deep interest in the restoration of peace in the Island of Cuba. The petition also prays that the President of the United States be requested at as early a date as possible consistent with due regards for the rights of Spain as a friendly nation to recognize the belligerent rights of the revolutionary party now existing in the Island of Cuba. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL presented the petition of Benjamin T. Clark and 105 other citizens of Bound Brook, N. J., and the petition of Luther Walling and 60 other citizens of Belford, N. J., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. ALLEN. I present the petition of J. J. Boyle and 300 other private soldiers of the California Soldiers' Home, located at Los Angeles, upon the subject of discrimination in pensions. The petition is short and important, and I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be read.

The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

SOLDIERS' HOME, Los Angeles, Cal., January 30, 1896.

Having seen with regret, if not alarm, the rapid formation of classes in our once free Republic, and noticed the constant tendency of the legislation to foster and encourage the same, it is with profound satisfaction we view the position taken by United States Senator ALLEN of Nebraska in opposing the granting of special pensions of extravagant and unreasonable sums to the widows of officers, while those ex-soldiers who sacrificed as much, if not more, are put off with a mere pittance, if not rejected altogether on some technicality.

We therefore desire to express our very highest admiration of the Senator in daring to stand up in the present United States Senate and oppose the principle being put in law that makes one citizen better than another in consequence of wealth or position. The following is Senator ALLEN'S own language as delivered before the United States Senate on January 14, 1896:

"I want to go on record as opposed to any distinction between the widow of a private soldier and that of brigadier-generals, major-generals, or any other generals.

"It was the plain private soldier who met the blunt of the war."

Believing, as we do, that all men are born equal and are entitled to equal and exact justice, we desire that the above sentiments be immortalized—the Declaration of Independence must not be crushed.

Signed by J. J. Boyle and 300 other ex-soldiers.

Mr. HILL. Very well; let it read "opened on the 5th."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

CENSUS OF EX-SOLDIERS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit a resolution which I desire to have read, printed, and lie over under the rule.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas a proviso contained in section 17 of an act entitled "An act to provide for taking the Eleventh and subsequent censuses," approved March 1, 1889, reads as follows:

"Provided, however, That said Superintendent shall, under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, cause to be taken on a special schedule of inquiry, according to such form as he may prescribe, the names, organizations, and length of service of those who had served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the war of the rebellion, and who are survivors at the time of said inquiry, and the widows of soldiers, sailors, or marines"; and

THE REVENUE BILL AND SILVER COINAGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. QUAY that House bill 2749, reported by the Committee on Finance with an amendment, be recommitted to that committee with instructions to report the original bill and the amendment as separate propositions.

Mr. TURPIE. I gave notice last Tuesday that at the conclusion of the routine business of the morning hour to-day I should call up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 66) introduced by me and move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that on the motion to refer I would submit some remarks upon the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Indiana that we are still under the head of morning business. The resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania is a part of the morning business.

Mr. QUAY. Before the resolution is taken up for consideration I desire to modify it by striking out all after the word "committee," in the third line, and inserting in lieu thereof "for further consideration." I understand that it is the desire of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] to proceed with the consideration of his joint resolution to-day.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to have the amendment read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out of the printed resolution all after the word "committee," in line 3, in the following words: "with instructions to report the original bill and the amendment as separate propositions," and insert in lieu thereof "for further consideration"; so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the bill H. R. 2749, reported by the Committee on Finance with an amendment, be recommitted to that committee for further consideration.

Mr. QUAY. I believe that under the rule I have a right to make the modification I have suggested.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be modified as indicated.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he will not be kind enough to permit the resolution to lie over without prejudice, that the Senator from Indiana may address the Senate, after which I shall ask the Senate to take up Senate joint resolution No. 48.

Mr. QUAY. I have no desire to press the resolution immediately, and if the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber will agree to the arrangement, I will agree that it shall go over until Monday, at the conclusion of the morning hour, in order that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] may proceed with his remarks this morning, and that the joint resolution which the Senator from North Dakota has in charge may be disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator proposes to modify his resolution. I suggest to him that he present his modification now, so that it may be printed with the resolution.

Mr. QUAY. The modification has already been made.

Mr. HARRIS. I was not aware of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me there can be no objection at all to recommitting the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HILL. There is objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see any necessity for delay. I imagine, as a matter of course, that this is a formal proceeding. I hope the resolution will be disposed of in that manner, so as not to stand in the way of other business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit to the Senate the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUAY. The request is, I presume, distinctly understood. It is that the resolution shall go over until the conclusion of the morning business on Monday, and shall then be disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAY. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will again submit it to the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. I may not object, but I want to know a little more about it. I do not see any necessity to put it off. There is certainly no necessity to recommit the bill in order to accomplish all the Senator from Pennsylvania desires, because if he wishes to have a vote on the silver amendment as a separate proposition, it can be offered as an amendment to the original bill as it now stands, and that amendment will take precedence of a motion to strike out and insert. The sense of the Senate can be taken on it just as well; there is no complication whatever about it. If you want a vote on the two propositions separately it can be offered as an amendment to the original bill, to perfect the original bill. You can then move to strike out. All the votes can be taken in the Senate the way the bill now stands that could be taken after recommitting it. I see no possible object in referring the bill back to have the propositions separated, when it is entirely within the power of the Senate in the ordinary way to reach a separate vote upon the questions.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to know what the request is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the request. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the pending resolution shall go over until the close of the morning business on Monday.

Mr. QUAY. That request, I will state, is made of the Senator from Pennsylvania by other Senators on this floor, and he acquiesces in it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MORGAN subsequently said: I submit an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. I ask that it be read and printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add to the resolution the following:

And with the further instruction, that the committee report the following as an amendment to the House bill No. 2749:

"That there shall be deducted from the customs duties that are or may be imposed by law upon articles imported from other countries into the United States for consumption, 10 per cent of such duties when such imports are made in vessels of the United States or in vessels of the country in which such imported articles were produced: Provided, That the country in which such articles are produced shall by law provide so that silver bullion the product of mines in the United States shall be admitted to coinage in the mints thereof on equal terms with gold bullion, and shall be received, without discount or discrimination, in payment for all customs dues on articles imported into such country, as full legal-tender money."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. If I remember correctly, there is a resolution on the table, offered by me on the 4th instant, which I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], coming over from a previous day.

Mr. TURPIE. I wish to make this point of order: I gave notice on last Tuesday that to-day, at the conclusion of the routine business of the morning hour, I desired to be heard on the joint resolution regarding the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, and the resolution referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire is not a part of the routine business of the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator that the resolution is part of the morning business.

Mr. TURPIE. But the point I make is that it is not part of the routine business of the morning hour, which is the presentation of petitions, reports of committees, and whatever is in regular order as a part of the routine business of the morning hour. But the consideration of a resolution on the table going over from day to day is not a part of the routine business, although it is part of the business of the morning hour. I want especially, because I had asked it many days ago, the courtesy of the Senate to be heard at this hour.

Mr. GALLINGER. While I do not agree with the contention of the Senator from Indiana that a resolution which comes over under the rules does not become a part of the morning business of the next day, I have no disposition to press the matter, and will simply ask that the resolution in relation to pension statistics heretofore offered by me may go over until the next legislative day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. STEWART. The resolution of inquiry submitted by me ought to be passed at once or it will be of no avail.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution heretofore submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. STEWART February 4, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to furnish the Senate an estimate of the probable increase of the revenue if bill H. R. 2749, entitled "A bill to temporarily increase revenue to meet the expenses of Government and provide against a deficiency," should become a law; and what would be the duty per pound in United States money on the different grades of imported wool according to the present market price; and is the proposed duty on wool provided for in said bill sufficient to compensate for or correspond with the increased duties proposed on woolen goods.

Mr. TURPIE. I now ask to have taken from the table the joint resolution introduced by me on Tuesday last and that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator in a moment. The pending question is on agreeing to the resolution which the Chair has laid before the Senate and which has been read.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the Senator from Nevada will allow the resolution to go over. I desire to offer an amendment to it, and I have had no opportunity to prepare it.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that, but I want to obtain the information which the resolution calls for.

Mr. GORMAN. Let the resolution go over without prejudice.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; I have no objection if it goes over without prejudice, so that it may come up to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolution will go over without losing its place.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY THE PEOPLE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Indiana, which will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 66) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people of the United States, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall become and be a part of the Constitution, namely:

That section 3 of Article I be so amended that the same shall read as follows:

"SEC. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, who shall be chosen by a plurality vote of the people of the several States, for six years, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures, and each Senator shall have one vote.

"When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State may fill the same by appointment until the time of the next general election, at which a Senator may be chosen by the people to fill such vacancy."

This amendment may not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator who may be chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

Mr. TURPIE. I move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion submitted by the Senator from Indiana, on which he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, it is said that the present mode of electing United States Senators was provided by the counsels and was approved by the wisdom of our ancestors. In one point of view their wisdom excelled that of this generation. They adopted policies and made laws for their own day and age. They looked at the United States as it then existed, both as to the people and the Government. They made no provision touching the right of suffrage, except that the members of the House of Representatives should be chosen by the people of the several States having the qualifications requisite in each State for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. That portion of the people who voted for such members of the legislature in each State were thus treated as representatives of the whole body politic.

The portion of the people thus entitled to vote was comparatively small—not numerous. Universal manhood suffrage, now grown so familiar to us, did not exist in any of the colonies at the time of the Revolution, nor in any of the States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. Other qualifications besides those of age and residence continued for many years to limit the number and to restrict the power of the electors.

It was doubtless the general extension of the right of suffrage in the several States which led to the gradual decline of the functions of their legislatures.

When the mass of citizens in a State first became voters voting only for members of the legislature and for Representatives in Congress, it was not long before they extended the use and application of the ballot to the choice of other officers. Governors, judges, the whole corps of administrative officers in the several States and in the counties and townships composing the same are now directly chosen by the people. In the older States one after another were made elective and the legislatures have been deprived of their former power of choosing these officers; in the new they have never been invested with that power. It might be said in a certain sense, even under these ancient forms of government now abolished, that the people chose the governor because they elected the members of the legislature who elected him, or that the people in effect elected the chief justice because he was appointed by the governor so chosen. But the history of political reform for more than a century makes answer that this condition of things did not satisfy the wishes of the people—did not satisfy the just demands of a free ballot or of civil liberty.

The system of election by proxy has been wholly abandoned and overthrown in the several States. The policy long and well established is that each citizen shall personally and immediately have his voice in the election of every public agent concerned in the administration of the Government. And if any man should in any State now propose that the governor, or the judges, or the auditor of public accounts should be chosen by proxy—that is, by the legislature—and should cite the practice of our forefathers as a model or example, he would be reminded that the wisdom of our forefathers was shown in adapting ways and means most suitable to their time and condition, that the wisdom of their descendants is to be shown in the same manner, and that the progress and growth of free institutions preferred and required the new and direct methods of election rather than the old. It is now time for us to pay a rational deference and respect to the memory of our ancestors, not by adhering to what they under different and other circumstances did, but by doing what they would have done under our present conditions.

Unfortunately, while the natural growth of the franchise has gone on—until it comprises in each of the States the whole number of male adults—the artificial polity, in respect to the composition of this body, continues unchanged. The ancient form of choice remains, but this form lacks now the substance. As compared with political conditions in 1779, we have in a very real sense a new people living and acting under an old system. A portion of the community, which had been formerly of small account in its direct influence upon the Government, has expanded and become strong, and it demands a place suited not to its former weakness but to its present power. We have already very perceptibly felt the pressure of the new wine in the old bottles in that continuous assault upon the constituent membership of this body, in the harsh denunciation of the action of legislatures in choosing the same, in that impatience and vehement expression of indignation at any action at all in conflict with that of the House of Representatives, and this doubtless not because the action of the two Houses may have been diverse but because the House is recognized as being of and from the people and the Senate is not of or from the same source. It may be said that these things are and always will be incident to our position in the public service, but this incessant disparagement of the conduct and action of the Senate increases daily in volume and severity and can not be disregarded. It is greatly enhanced by our refusal to submit the question of a change in the mode of our election, as it would be much diminished and allayed by the submission of this amendment, whether it were adopted or rejected. In some parts of the country it has already been mooted—publicly discussed—whether our present system of government would not be improved by an entire abolishment of the Senate.

I do not say that this overture has received the sanction of any considerable number of our people, but the fact of its agitation is not to be overlooked in determining our action herein. This suggestion is much aided by our attitude of hesitation and delay. Every reform necessarily implies a change in some existing method. All change is not reform. But the question of submitting a proposed change in our policy to the arbitrament of decision by the sovereign people may become almost as material and necessary to public order and to the general welfare as its adoption.

THE INVISIBLE EXECUTIVE.

It may be said without disparagement of our numerous fellow-citizens of other races that the prevalent and dominant type of our governmental institutions is in its origin Anglo-Saxon. The political history of that race for seven hundred years in England, the old home of our ancestors, may be summarized as a prolonged contest, sometimes with arms on the tented field, sometimes in the high debate of Parliamentary councils, between the prerogatives of the Crown and the franchises of the people. Very slowly but surely the people have overcome the Crown, until in these latter days the House of Commons, at first an unimportant and quite insignificant factor, has become the ruling power in the nation.

Many of the best men among our Revolutionary founders, having an intense sympathy with the people in this great historic conflict, entertained misgivings as to the effect of our own Constitution at the time of its adoption. They were jealous of the powers conferred on the Chief Executive. They said plainly the President may become, if not in name, in fact, a king. The power of the Executive, exerted through official patronage, always increasing with the growth of the country, might in the end result in serious menace to the liberties of the citizen. These grave apprehensions of the encroachment of the Executive authority have thus far not been realized. The intense devotion of our people to the autonomous freedom of the several States and the extreme detestation of the use of Presidential patronage to control opinion have checked this power, and we have been comparatively safe from its operation.

The danger to our institutions, and especially to the free exercise of our legislative functions, comes from another quarter. That levity of assent which we have used in the creation of corporations both in the State and in the nation has reared from small beginnings a power unnamed, unknown, not mentioned in the Constitution, which, like the famous genii of the Arabian tales, at first confined in a small space, but unwittingly released and let loose, overshadows the whole country with its gigantic form. This power is much greater than that of the constitutional executive—with infinitely larger patronage, with a proletariat composed of thousands of dependents; aiming at a dominion unrestricted by law, and despising liberty. Neither the dogma nor the practice of the division of powers is known to or recognized by this autocracy.

These numerous creatures of our own too facile legislation are wholly artificial, gifted, as is said by Blackstone, with a sort of legal immortality by reason of their prerogative of perpetual succession.

These organizations are decided by the courts to be persons, residents, citizens. These residents never remove, these citizens never disappear, these persons never die. I have heretofore alluded to the enormous growth and number of our bodies corporate in my remarks of December 6, 1894, in the Senate upon this subject.

"Many appellations or epithets have been given to this time of ours. Perhaps one, as appropriate as any other, at least in our own country, would be the Age of Incorporations.

"The jurisdiction and province of these institutions is no longer confined to great enterprises, the construction of public works, the distant transportation of freight and passengers, the opening of mines or quarries. Gainful pursuits of any kind are seldom now undertaken by persons as such. We have companies duly chartered and organized for the manufacture of almost every article, utensil, implement, or commodity sold in the market.

"Not only the carrier, the wagoner, the brazier, the shoemaker, and the smith have disappeared—the workmen in every art and mystery have vanished. The company has taken their room and place; they are forgotten or wholly merged in the corporate life and service.

"Nor is this strange transformation limited to matters of gain or profit. This universal hunger for incorporation, this world-wide riddance of personality, this negation of private action, finds numerous objects for its exercise elsewhere. For the redress of every wrong that is done under the sun there is some society formed and duly chartered. For the cure of every ill to which our race is subject, for the diffusion of every benefit whereof it may partake, there is a body corporate, with its president, vice-president, and board of directors, duly appointed according to the statute in such case made and provided.

"Is a pervading sense of separate weakness the secret of this rushing movement toward collective effort? If so, the men of our generation must have been deeply touched by a sense of their own infirmity.

"Whatever may be the motive or the reason for this tendency or condition, it obtains.

"This deluge of incorporations has not only reached but covered every field, valley, and height of human enterprise."

Had these incorporated societies confined themselves to their legitimate business, the profits to be made by skill, diligence, and ingenuity in their several crafts and vocations, and had been therewith content, they would still have been accounted as among the most remarkable phenomena of the present century. But they are not thus content or satisfied. They aspire to control the political functions of the Government and to enlarge their gains by direct legislation having for its object the increase of the value of their shares and dividends.

To this end certain of these associations have formed an organism, representing the aggregate mass of incorporations having the same or like interests—which is called the trust—alias the pool—otherwise the combine or combination. The life and force of this organism is concentrated in what is known as the executive committee. This new executive assumes strange powers, uses strange methods, methods unknown before.

It resembles very much the Grand Council of Ten, so famous in the history of Venice. The members of that celebrated council were unknown, except to each other. The time and place of their meeting were unknown. No written record was kept of their orders or proceedings. Its power was supreme. Whomsoever they bound in Venice was imprisoned. Whomsoever they condemned died by the hands of the executioner. Whatsoever law of the Republic or decree of the senate stood in the way of their administration was suspended, annulled, or repealed.

The organic law of this country provides very carefully for a distribution of powers. This new executive of the trust will brook no such distribution. Its avowed purpose is to control the executive, to control the judicial, and wholly to supplant the legislative department of the Government in all matters appertaining to the province of the pool.

The Constitution of the United States declares that the Congress shall have power to levy taxes, duties, excises, and imposts, but the invisible executive of the trust dictates absolutely what merchandise shall be free, what articles shall be exempt from taxation, what things shall be subject thereto, and the rate and per cent of the levy. In this mysterious syndicate which decides upon the act and fact of taxation, the people are without any kind of representation.

Herein taxation without representation is now as real a grievance as in the days of the colonial era before the Revolution.

The Constitution provides that Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. This invisible executive declares with imperious and imperial fiat, "All regulations are mine."

The old Executive (I speak of the office, not of the person) has the power to veto a bill after its passage; the new executive claims and exercises the power to veto a bill or any part thereof before its passage. The old Executive holds a term of office lasting four years. The new executive holds a term in perpetuity, unlimited. This is a terrible power, an absolutism beyond that of the Czar or the Sultan, omnipotent, irresponsible, and irremovable.

Yet it is the offspring of a free Republic, born of those franchises granted so lavishly, a progeny deformed and monstrous which turns to rend the people who gave it life and being.

Herein lies our danger most manifest. Liberty is of little moment when it is thus dominated by a despotism unseen, impalpable—amenable to no authority.

It may indeed be asked how is all this related to the subject in argument? Most closely, very directly. For it is alleged, and has been now for many years bruited with every circumstance of notoriety and publicity, that the central bureau, the chief powerhouse of this malevolent and intriguing usurper, is located at the capitols of the several States wherever and whenever a member of this body is to be chosen. Destroy the scene of its operations, this arena of its exploits, and it at once disappears. Dissolve this incorporeal aggregate of the trust, with all its dependents, retainers, and procurers into the original units which compose it, and we shall restore the ballot of opinion unawed, unbought. An act of faith such as the choice of a United States Senator by the people at a general election would render this evil genius of the Republic powerless for harm.

There is a virtue in the movement of popular opinion induced by a general election akin to that found in the tidal movement of the waters of the ocean—it dissolves and destroys all impurities; the whole mass is cleansed in every part. Everywhere is felt the touch of the invigorating savor. There is that integrity, that fearlessness, in the greater not found in the lesser number, especially when the smaller number acts in a representative character. The mass of men do not share the bribes of the tempter, and they treat his menace with disdain.

INHERENT EVILS OF THE PRESENT MANNER OF CHOOSING.

As has been formerly stated in the discussion of this proposed amendment, one of the greatest evils of the present manner of choosing United States Senators is the inability of the State legislatures to perform this duty. The failure of the legislatures to elect is becoming more and more frequent. When, during the last session, the instance was cited of some of the new States in the far West whose legislatures had adjourned after holding a session and balloting unsuccessfully for the full constitutional term of their existence, it was answered that these States were new, that their legislatures were without experience in the function of Senatorial elections, and that these conditions had made their action unavailing. But what will be said in relation to the condition now existing in the States of Delaware and Kentucky, two of the oldest States in the Union, in which the legislatures have had a prolonged experience in the election of United States Senators, where there was every motive and reason for a choice, yet the difficulties found in the representative elements of the legislative bodies have proved almost insuperable?

In the State of Delaware the general assembly balloted every day of the session from the first Tuesday in January, 1895, until Thursday, the 9th day of May following, without an election, and on the last day and in the last hour of the last day left us only a contest instead of a Senator chosen. The present status in the State of Kentucky, where the legislature is so evenly divided as necessarily to impose upon a very small minority the power to determine the pending Senatorial election, is an instance of like difficulty. This equilibrium of parties in the State legislatures and consequent domination of minor sections of opinion therein is an increasing mischief, due to the present mode of choice, not inherent in our general polity. No one has any right to disparage either the existence or action of a third party, or to deny its legitimate proportional voice in the conduct of public affairs, but when, as in some cases it has already occurred and is likely to occur in many more, the third party has set aside on either hand the voice of existing majorities, has impeded or wholly defeated the action of the greater number, such a defect in our system must give us pause, room, and opportunity for grave deliberation.

An examination of our internal political history will show that ever since the organization of parties, at the close of the second Administration of Washington, there has always been a third party. Extremely variant in name, policies, and purposes, yet there has constantly been a mass of voters who entered a sort of interlocutory dissent to the ideas and principles, whatever they may have been, of what were known as the two dominant parties of the country. This element of dissent has sometimes attained a representation in the House of Representatives; sometimes in the Senate; occasionally, though more rarely, it has reached the electoral college; but it has been much more frequently known and recognized in the legislatures of the States than elsewhere. There, if it have made any progress at all in public estimation, it is sure to be found. It has a right to be there, but it is owing to our present imperfect mode of choosing Senators that its presence becomes so potential, and that its power becomes vital, crucial, out of all proportion to the small number of voters who at the polls are known as its adherents.

A third party at the present time has somewhat of political representation in both branches of Congress, and in several States has a large number of followers. Sometimes it is said to be numerically larger than ever before, but this may be doubted. A third party from natural causes will increase as our population grows larger. Certain men will always prefer the byways to the beaten paths of political action, and the greater the number of men the more frequent will be the instances of departure. Judging the future by the past, it is quite certain that, although the third party now in vogue may disappear as others have done, a third party of some kind is to be accounted as a constant quantity in American politics, and, in defiance of all arithmetic and all rules of number and order, the third party becomes and has become in the history of this country the first or the second; and yet there is always a number sufficient to form another third party. Whether the state of political equilibrium in our legislatures, now so frequent, arises from the presence and action of a third party or from the personal divisions and private dissensions in one or the other of the principal parties there represented, the result is the same—the failure to choose, or the compulsory choice of some one not preferred by and not representative of the wishes and opinions of the greater number. The election of United States Senators by a plurality vote of the people would instantly remove this growing evil, and would immediately restore and perpetuate the legitimate rule of the majority voting.

To these evils more particularly noted must be added the complications which are liable to occur at any time from the death of one or more members of the general assembly, a mortality which would not disturb in any way an election by the popular suffrage; and also the perplexing and perpetual conundrum of legislative apportionment, becoming more and more intractable—both these causes of mischief constantly growing, not only in the frequency of their occurrence, but in the intensity of their operation, as the number of States and legislatures is multiplied. It is not, however, from the consideration alone of the grievous ills which beset the present system that a change is argued and demanded. Had these manifold and pernicious ills of the old method no existence, we should yet insist, upon the grounds of the political sovereignty and moral supremacy of the people, that those for whom all laws are made should directly choose the lawmakers.

I wage no Parthian warfare upon the past. We turn to the past, not to traduce or to denounce it, but with the most loyal sentiments of reverence and admiration, yet gathering therefrom both the law and the lesson of real political development.

Forty-five senates in the several States are to-day elected by the popular vote. Every State in the Union has placed its legislative department directly under the control of the people. Why should not the Senate of the States united be chosen in like manner?

A free representative democracy, with a constituency of 70,000,000 of inhabitants, must of necessity be a government of legislative proxies, but these proxies ought to be chosen by their principals, the people.

There is no room, no reason for the functions of middlemen in a transaction of such momentous character.

Such a change would be in full harmony with the spirit of the Federal compact, would marvelously improve its symmetry, would establish that more perfect union which our fathers designed, not as finished, like some sculptured work of art in still life, but as capable of amendment, as susceptible of living growth, actual advancement, and continual progression.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

ARKANSAS AND CHOCTAW RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the table for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3812) to authorize the Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Choctaw Nation, in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes. It will take but a moment to pass the bill. It is a very important bill, I will state, and a similar measure has been reported from the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs. I desire that the Senate shall act upon the House bill instead of the Senate bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object, but I shall be glad if the Senator from Missouri will state briefly the substance of the bill and from what committee it comes.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill merely authorizes this corporation to complete its railroad from Arkansas into the Indian Territory. It has now completed 10 miles of that part located in Arkansas, and the balance is under rapid construction—all of the ties, timbers, and steel rails purchased, and most of the rails have been delivered. It is believed that all of the line in Arkansas would have been completed, but it was deemed advisable by the promoters to await the survey of the whole line, as the survey in the Indian Territory might show that it would be better from an economical standpoint and in other respects advisable to change the location of the line in Arkansas from its present terminus to the Choctaw line.

A bill for this purpose was introduced in the other House and another in the Senate. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] reported the Senate bill, and the other House passed its bill. There are very few changes in the House bill from the bill as reported by the Senator from Arkansas. I have conferred with the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs and they agree to the passage of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill (S. 1579) to authorize the Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Choctaw Nation, in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

INCLINE RAILWAY ON HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2175) to extend the time for the completion of the incline railway on West Mountain, Hot Springs Reservation. It is a little bill which will take but a moment, being practically in one section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. If it is the intention of the Senate to act upon the joint resolution relating to the distribution of seeds, I hope we will proceed to its consideration.

Mr. BERRY. I appeal to the Senator from North Dakota. Senator after Senator on the other side has had permission for the passage of bills, and I have not asked for the consideration of any other bill during the entire session. It will not take five minutes, and I ask him to allow the bill to be passed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have given repeated notice that I would call up the joint resolution. I have just yielded for a bill which it took almost a half hour to read, and I do not see that I can afford to yield further if I have any rights here in the premises.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from North Dakota can yield for five minutes.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator will lose more than five minutes before he gets the joint resolution through.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Then I shall have but twenty minutes left before the unfinished business is laid before the Senate.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LODGE. What is the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRAINERD AND NORTHERN MINNESOTA RAILWAY.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Having yielded to one or two Senators, I accord the same courtesy to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3009) granting to the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company a right of way through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation and Chippewa Indian Reservation, in Minnesota. It is a bill which has been passed by the other House and has been reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill was read.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Minnesota if the usual clause is contained in the bill, that Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act?

Mr. NELSON. I think it is in the bill. The bill has been before the Interior Department and has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator that it has been the custom of Congress, as in the bill just passed a few minutes ago, to insert a clause to the effect that Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act.

Mr. NELSON. An amendment will simply delay the final passage of the bill. They are required to build the road within three years, and as a matter of fact almost all of the road is really built.

Mr. CALL. I think the Senator ought to add that clause, as it has been the custom.

Mr. NELSON. I hope the Senator will let the bill stand as it was passed by the other House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CALL. I move as an amendment, in accordance with the uniform custom of the Senate for many years, to add at the end of the bill as an additional section:

Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PROHIBITION OF PRIZE FIGHTING.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 5566) to prohibit prize fighting and pugilism and fights between men and animals and to provide penalties therefor in the Territories and the District of Columbia was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senate to pass that bill at once. I have examined it. As the members of the Senate are aware, the prize fighters after going from Texas to Louisiana and then into Mexico have been driven out of Mexico, and they are now proposing to have their prize fight in New Mexico. This is a proposed United States law to prohibit it there. It ought to be passed now, so as to become a law within a few days.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of the morning hour to the Calendar.

SIOUX INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3728) to amend section 21 of an act entitled "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889. The bill was reported by me a few days ago from the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 28, after the word "shall", to insert "be for a longer period than ten years, and shall"; so as to read:

Provided, That such leases shall be for a longer period than ten years, and shall not in the aggregate embrace or cover more than one-third the area of said land.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The amendment as stated is not what was intended. It should read that no lease shall be for a longer period than ten years. I wish to correct the amendment so as to make it read "that no lease shall be for a longer period than ten years."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be modified as indicated by the Senator from South Dakota. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. HILL. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. 1464) to amend chapter 76, laws of 1893. The title of the bill does not disclose its real purpose. Its real purpose is to extend the time within which a bridge over the St. Lawrence River can be built.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 4 of the act approved February 9, 1893, authorizing the St. Lawrence Railway Company, of the State of New York, to build and maintain a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at some point in St. Lawrence County, State of New York, by extending the time for the completion of the bridge to February 9, 1898.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMISSION OF FINES AND FORFEITURES.

Mr. WHITE. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 1740) to amend section 5294 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to remit or mitigate fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and for other purposes.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 5294 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, approved December 15, 1894, so as to read:

SEC. 5294. The Secretary of the Treasury may, upon application therefor, remit or mitigate any fine, penalty, or forfeiture provided for in laws relating to vessels or discontinue any prosecution to recover penalties or relating to forfeitures denounced in such laws, excepting the penalty of imprisonment or of removal from office, upon such terms as he, in his discretion, shall think proper; and all rights granted to informers by such laws shall be held subject to the Secretary's powers of remission, except in cases where the claims of any informer to the share of any penalty shall have been determined by a court of competent jurisdiction prior to the application for the remission of the penalty or forfeiture; and the Secretary shall have authority to ascertain the facts upon all such applications in such manner and under such regulations as he may deem proper.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from California to state the purpose of the bill.

Mr. WHITE. The bill simply adds the word "forfeitures" to the power already possessed by the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the penalties in certain cases, so as to obviate a technical difficulty experienced by the Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

R. G. M. BROWN.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1477) authorizing the President of the United States to nominate Lieut. Commander R. G. M. Brown, now on the retired list, to be a commander on the retired list. The bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Naval Affairs and is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move to strike out the preamble of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED DISTRIBUTION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. DUBOIS proposing an amendment to paragraph 1 of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add to the resolution:

All appropriations relating to the construction, purchase, or maintenance of public buildings and grounds shall be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Rule XXV shall be amended as follows:

"The Committee on Finance shall consist of 15 members."

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. QUAY. As the Senator from Idaho declines to accept the amendment, I will not press it.

Mr. DUBOIS. I could not hear the remark made by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUAY. When I offered the amendment yesterday I requested the Senator from Idaho to accept the amendment, as I thought it was in the line of the general idea of the resolution. He declined to do so, and I will not press it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw the amendment?

Mr. QUAY. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. FRYE. There was an amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], I remember.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Notice has been given of that amendment. It may now be offered, but it has not yet been in order to offer it.

Mr. CALL. I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the resolution:

After the appropriation bills shall be reported to the Senate by the several committees they shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations for consideration and report to the Senate of the total amount of the appropriations and such recommendations in relation to the amount of such appropriations and the changes in such bills as may be necessary to keep them within the revenues of the Government and adequate for its requirements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], upon which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to make some observations, not upon the amendment, but upon the resolution, at this time. Of course, I will yield to the Senator from Florida if he so desires.

Mr. CALL. I do not desire to take the floor from the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. DUBOIS. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. With pleasure.

Mr. DUBOIS. On December 11, soon after the meeting of this Congress, I made a speech on the pending resolution. I was arguing as to the extraordinary powers of the conferees, and from what has occurred in the Senate since I am satisfied I used an illustration which would properly be considered as a reflection upon the conferees and upon the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I did not intend that at all, but I used the following language:

A provision was slipped into that bill—

Referring to the sundry civil appropriation bill—

by the conferees withdrawing all the public lands which were embraced within the arid region of the country from settlement until certain impossible conditions are complied with.

The facts were that that amendment was added in the other House to the bill; that the conferees on the part of the Senate endeavored to get it out; and that the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] added another provision which modified the House amendment. I think this explanation is due, because I have no disposition whatever to reflect upon the Committee on Appropriations, much less its distinguished chairman.

Mr. ALLISON. I am much obliged to the Senator from Idaho for himself making this explanation, as it certainly was due to the conferees that it should be made.

Mr. President, this is not a new subject that we have in the Senate at this time. It has frequently appeared here before; but it appears now in rather an unusual way. The established custom and rule of the Senate has been and is that all questions of public importance or that relate to the organization of this body shall have, in the first instance, the consideration of a committee of this body. During a somewhat prolonged period in this Chamber I have never known a case where it was suggested by a Senator that a proposition should be referred to the appropriate committee for its consideration and report in the first instance that that has not been done. We have in this Chamber and have had almost from the foundation of the body a Committee on Rules, whose duty it is to prepare or modify or change the rules of the Senate and bring into the body the reasons for such proposed change.

The Senator from Idaho, on the 5th day of December, the third day after the convening of the present session, offered this proposition and asked, not that it be referred to a committee, but that it lie on the table in order that he might make some observations respecting it. On the 11th day of December the Senator from Idaho expressed his views upon this subject, and then the resolution again went to the table. Day before yesterday the Senator from Idaho called up the resolution, displacing an appropriation bill of an urgent character, and asked the Senate to consider it. A large majority of this body, I agree, voted to consider the resolution, and I find no fault with that vote or with the consideration that is now going on, except that before it is disposed of and before we take a final vote upon it it is our duty, it seems to me, that it shall have the considerate care of one of the standing committees of this body. That will be necessary for the reason that the proposed amendment of the rules as it now stands is impossible of execution consistent with the other rules of the Senate which are to be left unchanged, as I shall presently show. If we adopt the resolution now it will be necessary for the Committee on Rules of itself to take up this question anew and deal with other rules that are inconsistent with the provision proposed by the Senator from Idaho. I think this is a question of importance to the orderly and necessary procedure of the Senate. But laying aside that question, believing as I do that this is an unwise provision, I shall endeavor to give some reasons, in my mind at least, why the proposed change should not be made.

I have before me Rule XVI, quoted yesterday by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], but which I desire to quote again for the reason that it shows how careful this body has been in the past to surround the question of the consideration of appropriations of public money from the Treasury of the United States. Rule XVI is a modification, it is true, but not a serious one, of the rule of this body from time immemorial which has thrown around the appropriation of public money such safeguards and restrictions as will guard the public Treasury.

RULE XVI.

1. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session—

The last clause was a modification of the rule; it was an innovation—or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

"Or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments," which, you see, gives a marked significance and distinction to the estimates made by the Secretary of the Treasury, as the estimates are bound to be so made now by law. There must be the report of either a standing or a select committee, an estimate from the head of a Department, or the passage of a bill by the Senate at the session when the amendment is proposed which authorizes the expenditure.

In addition to that there is a second clause, which provides for amendments, as follows:

2. All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are considered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and when actually proposed to the bill, no amendment proposing to increase the amount stated in such amendment shall be received; in like manner amendments proposing new items of appropriation to river and harbor bills shall, before being considered, be referred to the Committee on Commerce; also amendments to bills establishing post-roads, proposing new post-roads, shall, before being considered, be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

We shall be in the anomalous position, I will say as I go along, if this resolution shall pass, of having all the other committees of this body reporting bills and amendments here, having had them considered in their committees, whereas all amendments to these bills coming from any other committee or any other source must, under this rule, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which has had no part in the consideration of the bills themselves. This illustration alone shows how important it is that amendments proposed to the rules of the Senate shall, before we are called upon here to finally vote upon them, have the judgment of the appropriate committee as to all the changes which are necessary in order to harmonize the present rules with those proposed.

But I read this rule for a wholly different purpose than to call attention to this situation; and I shall not stick in the bark as to the rule. The intent and purpose of this rule was to limit and restrict appropriations of public money in such a way that there could not be forced upon appropriation bills legislation which might not be convenient or agreeable to either House of Congress, or especially to that House which refused to consider such proposed amendments. In other words, it was to throw around appropriations such safeguards and conditions that they would not be left, if I may use the word, to the caprice or the sudden consideration of a majority of any legislative body.

Why was this done as to appropriation bills? I have given the reason. It was that legislation should be considered with deliberation in both Houses, and that it should not be within the power of either House to say the Government will only be carried on on condition that you will accept the legislation we want. It was in effect saying to the Senate of the United States, "You can not put legislation upon an appropriation bill and coerce the coordinate body by saying to them 'you must take this legislation as a condition of the appropriation of public money to carry on the Government.'" It was to throw around the House of Representatives the same restriction, because their rules are of the same character as ours, and they are more rigidly enforced than are the rules of this body.

Mr. President, what is the process under the law and under the rules of the two Houses whereby money is appropriated which has been gathered into the Treasury either by taxation or by selling bonds which are to run thirty years or any other length of time, taxing the present generation for the interest and the next generation for the principal? Early in the history of this Government one of the first laws which was passed by Congress, dating on the 2d day of September, 1789, soon after the Department of the Treasury was established by law, provided in the second section of an act to establish the Treasury Department, found on page 65, volume 1, of the Statutes at Large—

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit; to prepare and report estimates of the public revenue and the public expenditures; to superintend the collection of the revenue; to decide on the forms of stating and keeping accounts; * * * to make report—

I do not quote the whole section—and give information to either branch of the Legislature, in person or in writing, as he may be required, respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office.

So that in the first statute establishing the Treasury Department these estimates which come into our rules had a status and standing, giving the Secretary of the Treasury power to make estimates to both Houses of Congress. Under our rules, when so made, these estimates are given the sanction and power of a bill which may have passed this body. This was modified by the statute of May 10,1800, found in volume 2 of the Statutes at Large, page 79, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to digest, prepare, and lay before Congress at the commencement of every session a report on the subject of finance, containing estimates of the public revenue and public expenditures, and plans for improving or increasing the revenues, from time to time, for the purpose of giving information to Congress in adopting modes of raising the money requisite to meet the public expenditures.

It is under that ancient statute that the Secretary of the Treasury now makes his report direct to Congress rather than to the President of the United States, as other departmental officers do.

There are some intervening statutes, but I shall not trouble the Senate with them. In the act passed August 26, 1842, it is provided in section 14, volume 5, of the Statutes—

That it shall be the duty of the several heads of Departments, in communicating estimates of expenditures and appropriations to Congress and to any of the committees thereof, to specify, as nearly as may be convenient, the sources from which such estimates are derived and the calculations upon which they are founded, and in so doing to discriminate between such estimates as are conjectural in their character and such as are framed upon actual information and application from disbursing officers; and in communicating the several estimates reference shall be given to the laws and treaties by which they are authorized, the dates thereof, and the volume, page, and section in which the necessary provisions are contained.

So the Book of Estimates since 1842 has been required to show not only that the estimates are authorized by law, but also the date of that authorization, the amount, and the volume in which it is to be found.

These provisions were changed by section 3 of an act approved March 3, 1875, page 370, volume 18 of the Statutes, as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the heads of the several Executive Departments and of other officers authorized or required to make estimates, to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, on or before the 1st day of October of each year, their annual estimates for the public service, to be included in the Book of Estimates prepared by law under his direction; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall submit, as a part of the appendix to the Book of Estimates, such extracts from the annual reports of the several heads of Departments and bureaus as relate to estimates for appropriation and the necessities therefor.

I have one other statute which I wish to read. All these statutes relate to the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury and heads of Departments respecting expenditures authorized by law. This is found on page 254, volume 23 of the Statutes at Large:

Hereafter all estimates of appropriations and estimates of deficiencies in appropriations intended for the consideration and seeking the action of any of the committees of Congress shall be transmitted to Congress through the Secretary the of Treasury, and in no other manner; and the said Secretary shall first cause the same to be properly classified, compiled, indexed, and printed, under the supervision of the chief of the division of warrants, estimates, and appropriations of his Department.

Thus curtailing the power of the head of any Department to make an estimate for any appropriation until it has been submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, approved by him, and transmitted to the two Houses of Congress. Such estimates are transmitted, so far as the Senate is concerned, to the Senate from that desk, being addressed to the presiding officer of the Senate.

It may be asked why it is that I have quoted these statutes. I have quoted them for the purpose of showing that from the foundation of the Government it has been recognized that it was necessary that the greatest care should be exercised in order that the appropriation bills should be divested, so far as possible, of legislation, unless the legislation should appear to be necessary in making the appropriation.

Our fathers, the men who framed the Constitution of the United States, supposed that they had guarded carefully and well the provisions relating to the revenues and to the expenditure of public money. They deemed it wise, at least, to insert in the Constitution a provision restricting the power of Congress respecting the great questions of taxation and expenditure, drawing that provision from the custom of centuries in the English Parliament. They provided, it is true, only that—

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

In other words, that the taxing power of the people should not, in the first instance, be a part of the power of the Senate of the United States, though, of course, we have the power of amendment in this body, for the constitutional provision further says:

But the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

Then, although the language of the Constitution covers only "bills for raising revenue," it has been held from the organization of the Government that the constitutional power carried with it also the power of appropriating money. We have in this Chamber on three different occasions contested that power with the House of Representatives, one of them a most memorable occasion, wherein the Senate actually prepared appropriation bills and sent them to the House of Representatives; but that House laid them upon the table and paid no attention to them. Again, it was contended that we had power in this Chamber to originate appropriation bills, and a committee was appointed by the two Houses, called a committee of high privilege, wherein that question was debated for months, a report made in the House of Representatives denying that right, and a report made in the Senate asserting the right. But so well grounded now is the situation regarding appropriation bills that the Senate never undertakes to originate such bills.

So the appropriation bills which are dealt with in the pending resolution and in the present rule are not bills which originate here at all, but are bills which come to us from the other body, and come to us under their rules. Therefore it is necessary for us to adapt our rules to the House rules respecting the number of bills and what they shall embrace. So it has been that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] and my friend from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] have, temporarily at least, withdrawn the logical consequence of every argument that has been made in this Chamber for a change in the distribution of appropriation bills.

It is argued here that the appropriation bills ought to be distributed because the several committees have necessarily more knowledge of the subject matter of appropriations than can a separate and distinct committee have upon the same subject. If that be true, there is not a single topic of legislation that should not be divided and distributed among the several committees of this body.

It is true that my friend from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], in his kindliness and generosity to the Committee on Appropriations, leaves to it a skeleton of three bills, one being called the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, another the sundry civil appropriation bill, and the other the deficiency appropriation bill, for all deficiencies. If the logic of those who argue for this change be correct, then these bills of all others should be divided and distributed among the committees of this body. If the argument be that the Committee on Appropriations can have no knowledge of Army affairs, or of the affairs of the Navy, or of the affairs of the Interior Department, why should they appropriate money for the War Department, or the Navy Department, or the Interior Department? It naturally follows, or would seem to follow, that if this bill should be sent to the Committee on Military Affairs, because that committee necessarily has more and better knowledge regarding the distribution of money appropriated for the Army, they will also have a better knowledge respecting the personnel of those who are in the War Department and the compensation that ought to be given to those who are there employed; and this applies to every other Department of the Government. If you strip the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill of the provisions relating to salaries and compensation there would be practically nothing left of it.

I wish to ask some Senator who favors the pending resolution, if it be necessary that the expenditures which are made by the judicial department of this Government, including the expenditures in the Department of Justice, be made by the Committee on the Judiciary, why should not those made for all the courts of the United States also be considered by the Judiciary Committee, now so ably presided over by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and recently so ably presided over by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] who sits near me? The members of that committee are dealing with judicial subjects all the time; they are considering legislation in relation to the courts of justice, regarding the marshals and the district attorneys, and keep, as it were, an eye, and a keen one, upon all the subjects relating to the powers of the United States courts and their jurisdiction. That necessarily gives that committee a knowledge of these subjects. So I might illustrate by other heads of Departments and by other committees.

The argument made is an argument for the absolute dismemberment of the Committee on Appropriations. In other words, the Senators who have argued have, in my judgment, argued from wrong premises. Take the sundry civil bill, which is proposed to be left in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations. Let me analyze that for a moment, and see if the arguments which have been made here would not necessarily take the sundry civil bill practically from the Committee on Appropriations and distribute it among the various committees which have been named. They, it is said, are especially and distinctively qualified for the performance of the service required in making appropriations.

Take public buildings. I hold in my hand the appropriations for the current year. If there is nothing in this question of appropriations except simply how much the committees can have, or how much they think ought to be appropriated, surely the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which makes a special examination of all these topics, ought to have control of this subject. Last year we appropriated nearly $4,000,000 for public buildings in the United States. Is there any reason why the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should not have charge of that subject? If there is a reason, it is to be found in the logic of this whole situation, and that is that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds might be willing to appropriate ten or twelve million dollars, or $20,000,000, if you please, and still appropriate it wisely and judiciously for the Government itself. In a country like ours, extended as it is in its area, with populations growing with immense rapidity, with cities springing up in a week or in a year, where the Government carries its power and its influence through its courts, through its postal service, and through all the ramifications of a great country such as ours, is the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to appropriate, and, I have no doubt, properly to appropriate, ten, fifteen, or twenty million dollars for public buildings?

Why do not those who favor this scheme treat these committees alike? It has been said on this floor over and over again that Senators are equal and States are equal. So they are; and so they ought to be; and so they will be in this Chamber; but the question of the division of labor among the committees is a question as to the wisest and best method of reaching true results; and therefore it is that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, although they might report in favor of the appropriation of ten or twenty million dollars a year, must be, in a sense, limited in their appropriations and in their power by the revenues of the Government in the first place, and, in the second place, by the necessary distribution of these revenues among all the departments of our Government, and the necessary expenditures to be made therein in order that our progress may be continuous.

Now, take the Committee on Commerce, so long and so ably presided over by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who sits in front of me. For a good many years the Committee on Commerce has had charge of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. HILL. The Committee on Commerce has always had charge of that bill, has it not?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; not always.

Mr. HILL. When did it not have it?

Mr. ALLISON. I think it has had that bill since 1846. I may be mistaken as to the date, as I speak from memory.

Mr. HILL. It has always had.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Commerce has not always had it. That is my recollection. If the Senator from New York knows differently I will be corrected now.

Mr. HILL. I am advised that the Committee on Commerce has always had charge of that bill, if not directly, then indirectly, it having been customary for the Finance Committee, which always had charge both of appropriations and finances prior to 1867, to refer the river and harbor bill to the Committee on Commerce. It was the constant rule to do that.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly. That is practically done with respect to every other committee of this body.

Mr. HILL. I will say——

Mr. ALLISON. I will come to that matter, if the Senator from New York will excuse me. Does the Senator wish to interrupt me for anything special? If he does I will yield, but I do not wish to proceed further with this branch of the subject.

Mr. HILL. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate and the Senator to the fact that prior to 1867 the Committee on Finance had control of appropriations as well as the question of finance.

Mr. ALLISON. I am familiar with that.

Mr. HILL. And the change was made then, in 1867.

Mr. ALLISON. Then since 1867 the Committee on Commerce has had charge of the river and harbor bill. I was mistaken as to the date.

Mr. HILL. I do not state that. I say that prior to 1867 I think it was customary to refer river and harbor matters to the Committee on Commerce. That is my recollection.

Mr. ALLISON. The same custom was in existence then that prevails now; that is, consultation with committees as to appropriations affecting their particular duty.

Mr. HILL. It is not a custom now, but a rule with respect to the river and harbor bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. But now let us look into the sundry civil bill a little further.

Light-houses, beacons and fog signals, Life-Saving Service, Revenue-Cutter Service, Coast and Geodetic Survey—those are all attributes, if I may use that word, of the Committee on Commerce. All those subjects are under the jurisdiction and control of that committee, and the appropriation last year for the purposes I have just stated amounted to nearly $5,000,000. If the logic of the Senators who argue for the resolution is correct, then the Committee on Commerce should have those items also.

Take the Fish Commission. Why is it that the Committee on Fisheries is not embraced in the resolution? Why should not it have control of the appropriations for fisheries? It is a separate and distinct committee and one of the most important and ablest in this body. Yet the appropriations for this branch of the Government are to be considered by the Committee on Appropriations, who necessarily know but little on the subject, according to the logic of our friends.

I do not wish to go into the details of all the questions in relation to the different appropriations, but here is the Committee on Public Lands, presided over by the mover of the resolution, recently made its chairman, and familiar with the whole topic. We appropriate for public lands $1,200,000 annually. Why should not the Public Lands Committee take control of that appropriation and deal with it rather than that we should have a select committee specially devoted to that and kindred subjects?

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. If that appropriation were contained in a single bill, by the customs and usages of the Senate would it not be proper to send the bill to the Committee on Public Lands? Why not?

Mr. ALLISON. Under the argument of the Senator and those who are associated with him that is the logic of the situation; and the rules of the Senate are brushed aside, it seems, without reference to a committee. How long will it be before the Senator from New Hampshire himself will be clamoring for such a change of the rules as will authorize the distribution of which we are now speaking?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator does not wish to mislead anyone.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not.

Mr. CHANDLER. The resolution takes the appropriation bills according to the existing custom and makes a little different distribution of them from the present system. The Senator from Iowa is trying to prove, I understand, that because that is done therefore each appropriation bill should be taken and cut up into twenty or thirty pieces. That does not follow at all from the argument. There may be a little reform in this world without absolute destruction of all human institutions.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true, and it was stated two or three times yesterday that we are engaged at this time in a great reform, in a sort of evolution; and I suppose we are. I was only arguing the logic of the gentlemen who insist that this distribution shall be made for the orderly division of the work of the Senate.

Now, take the Military Affairs Committee, with my distinguished friend the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] sitting near me, as its chairman and managing the affairs of the committee during his chairmanship with great ability, surrounded by other gentlemen of distinction and ability. If it be true that the appropriations should be thus distributed, I will ask my venerable friend the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]—not so venerable as I am, either—to tell me why we should make two bites at a cherry and leave the appropriations for arsenals, military posts, military parks, national cemeteries, and miscellaneous objects under the War Department, which embraces a variety of small and great things, including National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and State and Territorial Homes, amounting to three or four or five million dollars annually, to be provided for by a special committee designated for that purpose?

Mr. PROCTOR. Does the Senator from Iowa wish me to give a reason now?

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to give the Senator a reason in the line of the logic of those who support the resolution, which is that the other committees are better calculated to deal with those subjects than a committee whose only business it is to deal with appropriations of public money.

Mr. PROCTOR. One very good reason why they should not be changed, I think, is because the appropriation bills originate in the other body. They are sent here all framed, and it is not for us to tear them to pieces. The pending resolution contemplates nothing of the kind.

Mr. ALLISON. That is an answer, but it is not the answer that meets the logic of those who are arguing for the resolution, because the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] day before yesterday introduced an amendment providing that those appropriations should also go to the Committee on Military Affairs, a logical movement.

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes; and he withdrew it on consideration.

Mr. ALLISON. He withdrew it on consideration, and I suppose after consultation, giving notice that a joint resolution was required for that purpose; and how long does it take my ingenious friend from Vermont to prepare a joint resolution to reach any purpose he has in hand?

So I could go on with the appropriations. Notwithstanding the fact that the Committee on Commerce has the question of rivers and harbors before it under the rules, the Committee on Appropriations is now bound to consider and does consider all appropriations for rivers and harbors where specific contracts have been made or where the appropriations run for a limited and specific period. Last year there were appropriations amounting to $9,000,000 for river and harbor improvements in the sundry civil bill. I think by the resolution those matters are taken away from the Committee on Appropriations and that it will be necessary under the resolution now proposed for the Committee on Commerce to take charge of those appropriations. I do not see, of course, how they can be segregated from the sundry civil bill.

So I might go on and speak of these matters, but I mention them merely for the purpose of illustrating the logic of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], who says that the main reason for the resolution is to distribute the power of the Senate. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] is a little more discreet and a little more gentle to the Committee on Appropriations. He says he wants to destroy the monopolistic power of the Senate. He has gathered a phrase from my friend, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], on that subject.

What is the power of the Committee on Appropriations? Under the rules it is to report appropriations authorized by law and nothing else. If all the committees which I have named have a better knowledge of what should be the appropriations which are authorized by law, then, of course, all the appropriations which are left to the Committee on Appropriations should be assigned to those several committees. Especially is that true of deficiencies. Here is the Army appropriation bill, and there is a deficiency in the appropriation for the Army or for the Soldiers' Homes or for some other branch coming properly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs. Why should such a deficiency be sent to the Committee on Appropriations when the original appropriation, the source and origin of the deficiency, was considered by another committee? That is true of every other deficiency, and yet this skeleton of a committee is left with a view of dealing with and gleaning from those old appropriations the deficiencies which have been created or which are made necessary by reason of expenditures beyond the appropriations.

Mr. President, from the reasoning, then, of those who favor this sweeping change it would seem that it is easy to provide for all the appropriations without the Appropriations Committee. I think the philosophy, if I may use that word, or the reasoning which requires a separate and distinct committee to deal with appropriations is manifestly wise. Until 1867, as the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] has already called attention to the fact, the Committee on Finance dealt with these subjects. We went through the period of the war, expending millions upon millions of dollars, raising armies to the extent of nearly 3,000,000 men, and during all that perilous period we, in this body, assisted in raising revenue and in appropriating money chiefly under the guidance and direction of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who is still familiar with those scenes and times.

In the House of Representatives it was never supposed that the Committee on Ways and Means would be deprived of this power until 1865. I was then a member of the House, and I can speak of what I know. Then under the exigencies of the election of a Speaker of the House it was found necessary to divide up the Committee on Ways and Means in order to form two other committees. And at that time the war was practically ended, because the division did not take place until December, 1865. Up to that time the Committee on Ways and Means of the other House dealt not only with the appropriations, but with the enormous internal and external power of taxation, and, in addition, with the power to raise revenues by the millions upon loans authorized to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury. I repeat what I said a moment ago, that that division would not then have been made except under the exigency of enlarging the number of committees.

Now, the reason why the power of taxation and the power of expenditures were lodged in a single committee from the foundation of the Government for the first seventy-five years of its existence was that taxation and expenditure should go hand in hand, that revenues and expenditures should be within the control and direction of men who knew the aggregate of the revenues and the aggregate of the expenditures, so that a wise Government, which desired to maintain its credit, would not by appropriations expend more money than by taxation it raised for revenue. We had not then reached this modern system whereby a Government in a single year can expend $69,000,000 more than it receives from its revenues and make the expenditure from money borrowed from the people upon the idea and the pretense that it is done to maintain the parity in value of the money circulation of our country.

I maintain, and I say it now as I may not think of it again, that a Government can not long endure if it borrows money in order to pay its current expenditures. In the last two and a half years we have expended $130,000,000 more than we have received into the Treasury by means of our revenue laws. In the last month we ran behind three millions and a half. Is it not worth while, then, for us to take some account of our revenues as compared with our expenses? For one I want them to meet as nearly as we can make them meet, and I hope that before long we shall be able to replenish the revenues which were provided for in the act of two years ago through the income-tax legislation, but which were lost by virtue of a decision of the Supreme Court. Can it be that we will go on, upon this side or upon the other side of the Chamber, and appropriate $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 more than is likely to be received into the Treasury from taxation, and borrow money for the purpose of paying the current expenses of the Government at the rate of $40,000,000 or even $25,000,000 a year at 4 per cent, running for thirty years?

When our expenditures and revenues were supposed to be equal to each other, it was supposed by the men who preceded us that taxation and appropriation should go hand in hand. But in 1865 in the other House they changed that system, so that there were a Committee on Appropriations and a Committee on Ways and Means.

I may be mistaken, I may be wrong, but I think that a matter of this character—taking money out of the Treasury or putting money into it, either by appropriation or by taxation—should be in the hands of a single committee of this body. Now, why do I believe it? I believe it because I think the Committee on Appropriations, as a committee, should have no other charge than that of appropriating moneys provided by law.

I will recur again to the question of other committees, and I will illustrate it. Take, for example, the appropriations for the Army. The Military Committee has been organized and is organized for the purpose of framing laws and supervising regulations for the Army of the United States. If it also has thrown into its hands and under its control the appropriations of money for the Army there is no committee of this body to supervise the expenditure. Without reflecting upon any committee of this body or upon any department of the Government, it is the most natural thing for the committees which have care and control of these great subjects to think that liberal appropriations are wise and advisable respecting them; and probably they are. What is true of the Army is also true of the Navy. How often do we find appropriations far beyond the necessities or the power of the Government under existing conditions to expend the money? When I say that I am not speaking against an enlargement of the Navy or against an increased appropriation for fortifications.

By some division of power in this body we now have a Committee on Coast Defenses, which has taken from the Committee on Military Affairs a part of its duty as to new projectiles and new, important, and extraordinary inventions in guns, gun carriages, powder, etc. The Committee on Coast Defenses has taken charge of many of those subjects. I believe, as I have no doubt we all believe, that we should improve and increase our coast defenses and provide liberally for the enlargement of our Navy; but we can only do it by carrying with it one of two things—either taxation or the power to borrow money.

So it seems to me that as to these two great branches of our Government, it is wise that their supervision should be in the hands of a separate and distinct committee, which can see, as it has hitherto done, how much we can afford to appropriate for these objects, unless we are to carry with the appropriations a provision that money shall be borrowed for that purpose.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question at this point? How would it be possible for the Committee on Military Affairs, for example, at a time when some extraordinary expense is thought desirable (I am not speaking of an emergency, but when the tendency was to increase the expenditure for the military establishment), to cut their coat according to the cloth, to use a homely phrase; in other words, how could they know what the Treasury would bear unless they sent around to all the other committees to whom the different appropriation bills had been distributed, and brought themselves into consultation with each one of them in order to form a rational and sensible view of what would be proper under the circumstances?

Mr. ALLISON. That is absolutely true, unless they were to provide by loan for expenditure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is not that very thing done in the other House where these bills originate? Do not all these appropriations go to the Military Committee?

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that where the bill originates the Military Committee has charge of the appropriations?

Mr. ALLISON. Where the bill originates that committee has charge of the appropriation. But that is no argument——

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa, before he proceeds, if that is not all the more reason for retaining in the Senate the present arrangement, that is, that there shall be a place where all the appropriations shall come under one head?

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for that suggestion. It is a very good one.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Iowa will allow me to suggest whether any committee now has supervisory charge of the appropriations for rivers and harbors in the Senate. We get along very well with that measure, do we not?

Mr. ALLISON. I think so. The Committee on Commerce has supervision.

Mr. HILL. Has any other committee supervision, I ask?

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations have every step in the river and harbor bill as a part of their duty. I mean the information which is given is always found in the room of the Committee on Appropriations as respects river and harbor bills and every other appropriation bill. If the Senator has watched the tables which have been printed from time to time, he will see they always embrace all questions respecting rivers and harbors.

Mr. HILL. It has no committee supervision?

Mr. ALLISON. Of course it has no committee supervision. I did not understand the Senator from Delaware to suggest that it was committee supervision; it is committee information that must be sought.

Mr. HILL. I understood the Senator to argue that there should be one committee having supervisory power over all appropriations, and therefore I suggested that when it comes to a question of logic the existing rule, which the Senator is commending, allows the Committee on Commerce to have power without restriction over the question of rivers and harbors. Therefore one is as illogical as the other.

Mr. GRAY. It is a question of degree. That is the only committee.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not judge of a great question by taking a single instance as an illustration. I am now upon the point, and I want to call the attention of the Senator from New York to it, that it does seem wise in the long years which flow on that the committee which originates legislation, whether it be to expend $50 or $50,000,000, ought to have some committee that is thoroughly independent in this body (I mean independent as respects that particular subject) to give the amount of money that can be appropriated for that expenditure this year and next year and the following years, if there is not money enough to provide for it in a single year.

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the Senator that if he entertains those views his duty would be best discharged by moving an amendment to the rules taking away from the Committee on Commerce this very power that it has so wisely exercised.

Mr. ALLISON. I am arguing now at large.

Mr. HILL. Quite at large.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not arguing from the single illustration of the Committee on Commerce, which is a great committee of this body and which has jurisdiction of rivers and harbors under the rules and the law.

Mr. GRAY. Will my friend allow me to suggest, in reply to the question of the Senator from New York, that the example which he cites of the Committe on Commerce in regard to the appropriations for rivers and harbors is one exception to be taken out of the general jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations? I should like to ask him whether, that one exception having been taken out, it logically follows that it would be wise to take many more out? One being taken out for reasons that may be peculiar to itself, leaves that one committee segregated in its jurisdiction from the mass of appropriations, and with the Appropriations Committee, to whom it can always refer and obtain information as to all other appropriations which are to deplete the Treasury. It is a question of degree.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course; but the Senator from New York will answer that question.

Mr. HILL. There is nothing to answer. I venture the assertion that the Committee on Commerce has never sent a communication to the Committee on Appropriations asking how much the pension expenditures this year are going to be, or any other question pertaining to it. All those things are known to every committee, because they are published, and therefore not only every committee knows them, but every single member of the Senate has equal information in regard to them as the appropriations progress. The only point involved is simply this: The Senator was suggesting, in answer to our proposition to enlarge the jurisdiction of several of the committees, that you might go further; that the logic of the situation required you to go further. Our answer to that is that the logic is just as much at fault on the other side, because the argument in favor of having one committee supervise all the appropriations is not kept in view by the present arrangement, where you have a single great exception. Of course it is quite difficult now to draw the line, as it is sometimes difficult to draw the line at what age a party shall be permitted to vote, but some age has to be fixed. So in making this arrangement by the proposition of the Senator from Idaho some line had to be drawn, and this, in my judgment, is the best that can be made.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to make a single suggestion in regard to the point that more than one committee should have charge of the appropriations? The fact is that the Committee on Commerce every year brings a bill in here that is reduced by many millions of dollars; it brings in a bill in excess of what the majority of the Senate consider to be appropriate and necessary.

Mr. HILL. Allow me to say that shows that possibly the wisdom of the Senate is greater than that of any one committee.

Mr. CALL. It also shows that the Senator from New York is entirely wrong in his proposition.

Mr. HILL. That does not follow.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to say a word to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. That proposition shows that it is perfectly safe to leave to the Senate the amount of the appropriations to be made in any one bill.

Mr. CALL. Not to one committee.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, it is curious that I can not make myself understood by the Senator from New York. Of course I know, as he does, that the Committee on Commerce is a single exception; but the logic of his observation is that the Committee on Appropriations should not exist because all the things that can be done by that committee are to be more wisely done by a distribution of power in this Chamber among thirteen committees.

I have heard it said sometimes that we do too much in the Committee on Appropriations and that we are at times overrun and overridden with work. That is true, and I wish it were not true. It has been especially true since the change made in the House of Representatives, because under the rules of the House a single committee that deals with an appropriation bill has no concern as to when it shall come to the Senate. They hold it back sometimes until nearly the last day of a short session and then it comes in here, and these bills are necessarily thrown into our committee, and they are considered, I will not say hastily, but they are considered with considerable inconvenience to those Senators who happen to be members of the Committee on Appropriations.

But suppose the bills are divided up as is proposed. If that is done, I want to make a prediction, that when we reach the end of a short session there will be a struggle here between the twelve committees on the last day of the session as to which of them shall get in its report first. In other words, the orderly procedure in both Houses, it seems to me, has always required that this great subject of appropriation of money should be allotted to a single committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my friend from Iowa a question. One of the plausible arguments made in favor of dividing up the appropriation bills is that each committee charged with the appropriation might then, without waiting for the action of the other House, prepare its bill, and then the two bills would be prepared as they are presented. The Senate has the same power of appropriation at the beginning of a session, and by its own committees, as the House.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHERMAN. The provision in the Constitution that revenue measures must originate in the House of Representatives does not apply to appropriation bills.

Mr. ALLISON. I touched on that question in the absence of the Senator. I have said that that is a mooted question, but the Senate never has passed an appropriation bill that has been assented to by the other House. So the power is exercised by the other House.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate has undoubtedly power to pass an appropriation bill to the fullest extent that the other House has, and it does it. We pass every day bills providing for the appropriation of money, sometimes enormous amounts.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly; that is done.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to interpose, but will the Senator from Iowa allow me?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I happen to have studied this particular question some time ago, and I think it is still fresh in my memory.

The phrase in the Constitution is that the bills for raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives. Of course, the letter of that provision does not include bills for merely appropriating the moneys so raised, but the House of Representatives at a very early day contended, and has ever since adhered to the contention, that the spirit of that constitutional provision included general measures for the expenditure of revenue, the general appropriation bills, because in every appropriation bill, certainly in every general appropriation bill, it must be a germane amendment, but perhaps an amendment forming a new provision for raising the money which would be expended—that is, if you are to expend for a general Government purpose $40,000,000—the Senate or the House might or might not agree to that bill, according as they found a practicable way of raising the money, and therefore the two subjects were inextricably connected.

Now, when that matter came up between the two Houses, Mr. Webster said from his seat in the Senate that, whatever might be his opinion, from the necessity of the case it was a subject which must be determined by the House of Representatives. As will be seen on a moment's reflection, whatever may be the opinion of the Senate, it is impossible that any view as to the right to originate an appropriation bill should prevail which is not the view of the House of Representatives. I think there were committees in both Houses that made written reports. The Senate acquiesced in that view and the House have maintained it ever since. I believe the first term I served in the House, from 1869 to 1871, when the Senator from Iowa was there—at any rate about that time—the question was again raised and the House of Representatives appointed a committee that made a new report; but the Senate again acquiesced in the view. So that practically, whatever may be the letter of the Constitution, it is as well settled as any constitutional rule in the country that the House must originate general appropriation bills.

Mr. ALLISON. That, I think, is well settled. Mr. President, it seems to me, then, without going at large into this question, because I do not wish to consume time, inasmuch as we have separated the raising of revenue and given that to one committee it is wise that we give the final supervision of the expenditure of money to another committee. That looks to me like a safe and conservative method of dealing with the people's money.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] yesterday dealt with some force upon the idea that here is an equality of States, an equality of representation, and to illustrate how badly certain sections of the country were treated as respects the Committee on Appropriations, he stated that not a single cotton State had a member upon that committee. The logic of my friend from Virginia would be that the money gathered in the Treasury is a sort of grab bag for the States, and that in its general distribution the States not represented on the committee were badly treated as distinguished from the States represented on the committee.

Mr. President, I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations for twenty-two years. The State in which I live has as little interest as any State, and, I might say, perhaps a less interest, in all the appropriations that are considered by that committee than any other State in the Union. We have had a few public buildings, and that is all. But the appropriations treated of in the Committee on Appropriations are not marked by State boundaries. They are appropriations that have no relation to States. Take the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, covering as it does an average of over $22,000,000. What is it for? It is for the people who are carrying on the varied affairs of this great Government of ours chiefly in the city of Washington. What is the postal appropriation bill? It is a bill which carries the mails from every part of this country to every other part by land carriage and by water carriage. The expenditure of that Department is $90,000,000 annually. The revenues that pay the expenditures are derived from 2-cent postage. If the constituents of my friend from Virginia write more letters than mine, then they pay more than do other sections of the country for this service. Here are two bills that cover $113,000,000 of the $400,000,000 that have been suggested by my friend as not justly and equally distributed among the States.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Does the Senator suppose that the people who live in that broad stretch of territory between the Potomac and the Rio Grande do not know a little more about what is the necessity for appropriations for their postal facilities than those who live in California or in Iowa? Would he not rather represent his own State in telling its needs as to appropriations than have a Senator from Texas or from New Hampshire do it?

Mr. ALLISON. If there was any discrimination, that is true; but the postal service runs upon every railroad of Virginia, as it does upon the mountains. It runs upon every water craft in Virginia as it does on the Mississippi.

Mr. DANIEL. But the fast through mail, for which a special appropriation is made, does not.

Mr. ALLISON. If my friend will allow me, that is a most unfortunate illustration which he has adduced. The fast mail, called special mail facilities, began in 1879, and it was intended for the Gulf States, and old Virginia as well. It begins in the State of Virginia. That is the only place in that part of the United States where special appropriations have been made for fast mails. If I have been criticised for one thing more than another, it was because I supported and sustained for a long series of years a special appropriation for the benefit of the Senator's constituents against the protest of different Postmasters-General and public officers of our country.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Iowa whether it is possible to have every district of country represented on the Post-Office Committee any more than upon the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not see how it is possible. The appropriations that are considered by the Appropriations Committee are not like the rivers and harbors appropriations, where there is a distribution; they are appropriations that depend upon laws to execute the various branches of the Government service. I have given two illustrations, the postal appropriation bill and the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. Take the Army and Navy appropriation bills that in the aggregate, exclusive of rivers and harbors, because that is an army expenditure, amount to $50,000,000 annually. Is it of any advantage to a man in a cotton State to have the privilege of voting the fixed salaries and compensation of the army officers and privates and the naval officers and privates? The question of the distribution of appropriations, the grab-bag principle, does not appertain to our committee at all.

It is necessary that the Committee on Appropriations shall be within reasonable limits as to numbers. We are told by gentlemen who are now active in the promotion of this scheme of my friend from Idaho that the difficulty with the Committee on Appropriations is that it is too small, and if we would enlarge it there would be no objection to continuing the plan which has prevailed since the Committee on Appropriations was organized.

Mr. DUBOIS. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. I desire to say distinctly that I myself never heard of any such proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not saying the Senator did. I am only saying, if I may be permitted now to speak on these topics, that it is a curious thing that only a month ago we thought it necessary to relieve somewhat the burdens of the Committee on Appropriations by adding four to its membership, and now it is to be relieved still further by distributing its bills practically to all the other committees who can possibly take jurisdiction of the subject.

Now, I want to say a word or two as respects another phase of the question that has been dwelt upon by Senators in this debate. It is that the Committee on Appropriations upon the part of the Senate has been guilty of increasing the appropriations over the bills as passed by the other House. I think my good friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] especially congratulated himself that the Indian affairs have been transferred from the ordinary committee to the Indian Affairs Committee in the House of Representatives, and that there has been a great improvement in the legislation in that regard, except that the Senate had put on doubtful and illegitimate claims and swelled the appropriations. Without speaking invidiously or criticising any committee of this or the other House at any time, I want to say that as respects the Indian appropriation bills they were largely increased under the new régime.

They came to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate with treaties and contracts innumerable that were put on in the House. Although they have a rigid rule there as to legislation upon appropriation bills, it was legislation to execute what they called existing treaties, and they were existing treaties. Therefore the Indian appropriation bills were swollen largely in the House of Representatives. They were swollen in this Chamber over the heads of the Committee on Appropriations by the Indian Affairs Committee of this body, in many instances, but I will not stop to name them. Whatever may have been the condition of appropriations as respects Indian affairs, that can not be laid to the door of the Committee on Appropriations, or to the fact that the Indian appropriation bill was not in the custody of the Indian Affairs Committee of the Senate rather than in the custody of a committee especially provided for that purpose.

Now, one word further on the question of increases of appropriations in bills. These increases of bills are inevitable for two reasons. I am not speaking of the present House because I am not authorized to do so; but the House of Representatives have uniformly made less appropriations than they ought to have made to carry on the ordinary business affairs of our Government. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] said the other day that they had made the appropriations for nine months and confessed that they had made them for nine months, leaving a deficiency for three months in order to show a small sum appropriated.

Mr. GEAR. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. GEAR. Is it not generally understood that in some of the committees of the House they have recommended the appropriation of less money than was necessary and then they have come over to the Senate and asked for an increase?

Mr. ALLISON. That has often occurred, but I am not speaking of what occurs privately; I am speaking of the public record.

Take the judiciary appropriations, with which every member of the Judiciary Committee is familiar. It has become almost a settled rule in the House to appropriate for only six months. That has been done for two or three years. I hope it will not be done this year. The bill that is now on your tables, known as the urgent deficiency bill, is largely composed of deficiencies in the judicial department of our Government, because when those appropriations were made they were made with a full knowledge that there would be large deficiencies. I know how difficult it is to make accurate estimates for the judicial service, because, in the nature of things, no committee and no Attorney-General can make an accurate estimate of what will be the expenditures of the courts in any given year; but for the purpose of keeping down appropriations and for the purpose of going upon the hustings and dilating upon the extravagance of the Senate and holding us up here on the cross-roads of public opinion as appropriating the people's money beyond the just needs of the Government, they have in past years in the House of Representatives neglected to appropriate the necessary funds to carry on the operations of our Government.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] the other day criticised with severity the Committee on Appropriations because of their extravagance and appropriating money when it ought not to be appropriated. There may be illustrations of that, I know, and doubtless they will occur to Senators on both sides of the Chamber. I recollect very well in the closing hours of the last Congress that the Committee on Appropriations had a whole day of its time occupied in the pressure upon it to consider an amendment, which came to us from the Committee on Claims, appropriating, in round numbers, $7,000,000 for the sugar bounty. We did not take cognizance of that question; we did not undertake to deal with it, but it was forced upon us under the sixteenth rule by a standing committee of this body, which sent it to us, and under the rule the amendment could have been offered on the floor of the Senate, and if it had received a majority could have been voted into the sundry civil bill. It came to us in that way, being in order under the machinery of this Chamber provided by the sixteenth rule, and we were obliged in the closing hours or days of the session to take up and ascertain the very right of the mattter as to a great appropriation involving six or seven million dollars. The committee finally decided, it is true, by a bare majority vote, that that was a just and fair amendment, modified as the committee amended it, and it was proposed here in the Chamber by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] now absent.

So, whatever pressure there is upon the Appropriations Committee in the last days of the session comes from the fact that other committees of the body insist that measures which they have failed to secure and accomplish in their regular bills shall, in the way of legislation, be put on appropriation bills. Therefore it is, that if these bills are distributed every committee of the Senate will have it within its power to legislate by and large upon all the great public topics which appertain to subjects within its jurisdiction and offer them as amendments to appropriation bills, and if they can get a majority of the Senate to agree that they are proper to be put on, it can be done.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will it not, then, be just as much out of order to legislate on appropriation bills as it is now?

Mr. ALLISON. It will. The point I make is that the Committee on Appropriations is obliged to deal with these questions, whether willing or unwilling, whether they ought to go on an appropriation bill or be kept off, the object being to secure these legislative provisions upon appropriation bills so that they may pass the other body without being publicly debated there.

It has been said and it has been believed that legislation and the appropriation of money should be segregated and kept apart so far as possible. There are instances, it is true, where the Committee on Appropriations, under the estimates of the Departments, provides appropriations which have not been previously authorized by law. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], having been chairmen of the Committee on Foreign Relations, know that as to our foreign service it is largely fixed on appropriation bills, so far as the salaries of our consuls and our ministers are concerned. The law upon the subject was passed in 1878. So, where it is necessary to enlarge our commercial or our diplomatic influence or power, these increases have generally been made upon appropriation bills.

The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] yesterday put in the RECORD a table showing increases and diminutions of salaries and the expenses of officers as found in appropriation bills. I do not know why he went so far back as the Fifty-first Congress to find a table, when a similar table is annually prepared by the clerks of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives. I have the last table which was prepared, and I call the attention of the Senator to it. It shows a large number of increases of officers. This was under the beneficent influence of a Democratic House of Representatives.

Mr. HILL. An increase of officers?

Mr. ALLISON. Both an increase of officers and an increase of salaries.

Mr. HILL. On appropriation bills?

Mr. ALLISON. On appropriation bills; some of them coming from the other House; none of them, I believe, put on in the Senate. I think my venerable and kindly predecessor will bear me out when I say that very rarely indeed have salaries been increased upon appropriation bills.

Mr. HILL. Where did the increase of the salary of the minister to Mexico come from? It crept in through the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. It was done through the Committee on Appropriations, after having been recommended by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it was a wise and just thing, so far as I know.

Mr. HILL. The point was, that it was said that the Appropriations Committee could not change existing law, and one of the arguments made was that they could not change salaries. My point was that while that was technically true, yet they were constantly doing it, and I cited numerous instances where they had. This gives them additional power, and virtually they have the control of the increase of salaries. Now it appears that the increase of the salary of the minister to Mexico was through the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. ALLISON. But the Senator does not draw the distinction between increasing and the increase going through the committee. This was a proposition made by another committee.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. ALLISON. Excuse me. I wish to make my own point and then I will listen to the Senator. The proposition is that the Committee on Appropriations, under the rules, can either sanction such an appropriation or can allow it to be presented in the Senate and agreed to. I do not know which was done in this instance, but I am not here to say to the Senator from New York that salaries are not increased and that salaries are not diminished on appropriation bills. There are certain salaries which have no other designation than on appropriation bills—that is to say, there is no statute, for instance, which says that a certain clerk in a Department shall have this or that salary. The clerks in the Departments are classified 1, 2, 3, 4, and now classified, I believe, downward to $720.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hold in my hand the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the Fifty-third Congress, second session, and I find under the office of Sergeant-at-Arms an amendment inserted by the Senate:

And $500 additional while the office of assistant doorkeeper is held by Isaac Bassett.

I find in the third session, on the same bill, this provision inserted by the Senate:

For clerk to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage and clerk to the Committee on Mines and Mining, at $2,100 each, for the fiscal year 1896 only, $4,200.

Those must have been increases made by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from New Hampshire undoubtedly was inattentive, or at least my observation escaped him, when I said there were certain salaries which were only fixed in appropriation bills. Notably so with the salaries of the officers and employees of the Senate. There is no law outside of the current appropriations from year to year which says what the salary of this, that, or the other officer here shall be. Those salaries are all found in appropriation bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; I agree to that.

Mr. ALLISON. I admit there are instances where persons well known to us here receiving inadequate compensation have received higher compensation in that way; but the great bulk of these increases—I am now trying to analyze the table inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from New York—do not come from either the House Appropriations Committee or the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Mr. HILL. How have they got in, I should like to know?

Mr. ALLISON. Through the statutes, through the laws.

Mr. HILL. Do the increases get in through the laws?

Mr. ALLISON. I am not speaking of increases just now. Take a new law—and there were numbers of new laws passed last year—the one in relation to the Steamboat-Inspection Service, for instance, which passed this body and the other House. We had to provide for that. Therefore the appropriations to carry out that law go into this table as increases of public officers and increases of appropriations. So as to the mineral lands in Montana, Idaho, and other States. We were last year confronted with such laws, and were obliged to provide for their enforcement in the appropriation bills. There was passed here, as Senators will remember, a statute as to the lands in those States. It was passed at the very last moment, and we put a provision in one of the appropriation bills for the compensation of those people aggregating $30,000. I might give other illustrations.

Mr. COCKRELL. How about the light-houses? A great many of them were established by special act and had to be appropriated for.

Mr. ALLISON. Appropriations had also to be made for the Light-House Establishment. We never insert an appropriation for a light-house unless we have one of two things. One is that it has been established by law through the Committee on Commerce of this body and through the like committee in the other body, or else the Secretary of the Treasury says to us that by some accident of flood or fire the light-house in existence has been swept away, and therefore he asks for an appropriation to rebuild it. I do not see the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] here now, but not long ago a flood raged upon the Atlantic coast and around the Chesapeake Bay, which swept down nearly $400,000 worth of public property. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] will remember it well; and, among other things, there were nine light-houses, if I remember correctly, which were swept from their moorings and carried out into the ocean. We were called upon in this Chamber, by an urgent letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in the interest of the seamen and navigators of the ocean, that we should straightway appropriate a large sum of money for that purpose; and I think we appropriated $200,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, in the Fifty-second Congress, second session, a statement of the appropriations, etc., develops the remarkable fact that 2,480 instances of increases are to be found, and 166 decreases. I think the Senator will not find that those relate to the Light-House Establishment or to any department of the Government such as that.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the Senator calls my attention to page 314, and gives the grand total. Of course I have not the time to examine this in detail, but my eye has just turned upon it, and I will give him some information as to it. First sergeants, by the Army appropriation act, were increased from $22 to $25 a month, making $430; and sergeants from $17 to $18 a month, making $2,027. In other words, of those increases of 2,480 officers, 2,450 were sergeants in the Army, one portion of them having their pay increased $1 and another $3 a month. This amendment must come clearly to the memory of two Senators who sit near me, who were interested in the subject, one of whom, I think, offered the amendments whereby these appropriations were made, and said they were just to this meritorious class of soldiers.

Mr. GORMAN. They were reported from the Military Committee.

Mr. ALLISON. They were reported from the Military Committee, I have no doubt, and presented here.

So you may take these bills from year to year, and you will find the appropriations have had reasonable care, and that the committee has given reasonable attention to these great subjects.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. Is it not a fact that nine-tenths of the increase of appropriations and of officers and their compensation come of necessity from the passage of laws passed during a session before action on the appropriation bills, for which we are compelled to appropriate?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly it is so in a very large number of cases.

Mr. FRYE. That was true especially in the case of the steamboat inspectors. That bill was reported by the Committee on Commerce, passed both branches of Congress, and while it increased a large number of salaries, it decreased others. It literally destroyed about a dozen or twenty offices of inspectors, and, taking the law altogether, it reduced the expenditure $12,000 a year.

Mr. ALLISON. My eye falls upon another item in the table presented by the Senator from New York, of the salaries of light-house inspectors, Life-Saving Service, superintendents of the Gulf coast, whereby they have been increased from $1,200 to $1,500. I do not remember whether that was put on by the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Commerce reported it, and it became a law.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true, I believe.

I only mention these things for the purpose of showing to my friend from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] that under the rules and under the practice of the Senate the committees of this body have unlimited power to deal with appropriations at their sweet will by complying with the provision which gives them a committee indorsement and referring their amendments to the Committee on Appropriations.
